Now, I submit in conclusion—and it was no part of my purpose to detain the Senate even so long—that when Senators on the side of the Chamber on which these two Senators sit are professing an ardent wish that the truth may see the light, that everything may come out touching the troubles in the South, it is rather extraordinary that a Senator who offered a little resolution on the 23d of December should find himself confronted on this day in January when he attempts to get sight at a report known to be lodged in the War Department. I submit to those Senators that they would consult not only courtesy toward a brother Senator but consistency, and allow us, and especially the Senator from Missouri, to proceed, if they would permit a resolution so simple as this to pass, and then in their own time bring forward their own resolutions when they can properly get a hearing for them.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot see how a report of Major Merrill got to the Secretary of War except through General Emory.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask my honorable friend a question. Will any Senator explain to me of what possible consequence is any question of etiquette which military martinets might raise whether this officer sent his report through General Emory or whether he mailed it to the Secretary of War, who is the superior of both of them? Does it not suffice for us to know that this report is in the War Department, came it no matter how it did, signed by this man, be he good, bad, or indifferent? There it is; it is supposed to state certain facts which the Senator will have an opportunity to combat; and now he reminds us that some newspaper has said that the etiquette being that it should proceed through General Emory, it did in truth come across lots by a short cut to the War Department!

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend from West Virginia will see that this is a debate which is doing great injustice to the Senator from Missouri. Nobody is opposed to a resolution calling for this information with other calls made for information which Senators consider to be important. But it is clear enough that there will be talk on every amendment that is offered. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from West Virginia will move to postpone this matter until to-morrow morning, when we can pass the resolution with such amendments as may be proper. I should like to offer an amendment myself to it, but I do not want to say one word that would occupy the time that ought to be occupied by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MERRIMON. I changed my substitute to an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas, and I understood that he was willing to accept it. If he does that, I am ready to take the question.

Mr. THURMAN. If that is the case, let it go.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the amendment be reported again; I think I shall accept it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment, moved by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us hear the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the resolution:

That the Secretary of War lay before the Senate the official letters, communications, and reports of General Emory, of the Army, in reference to any suggested disorders in any way connected with the late election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. CLAYTON. As that calls for additional information, I accept it with the greatest pleasure, put in the shape of an amendment. I cannot accept it as a substitute, because that would strike out my call.

Mr. DAVIS. If that be accepted, under the persuasive powers of my friend from New York I withdraw my amendment and will let the resolution pass so that the Senator from Missouri may have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia withdraws his amendment. The Senator from Arkansas accepts the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the resolution be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, to lay before the Senate the official reports and communications of Major Lewis Merrill, United States Army, relating to certain disorders in Louisiana; and that the Secretary of War lay before the Senate the official letters, communications, and reports of General Emory, of the Army, in reference to any suggested disorders in any way connected with the late election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to add: "unless they have been already communicated to the Senate or the House."

Mr. CONKLING. Let it read: "and not already in the possession of either House of Congress."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the ordinary words should be added, so as to save the copying of duplicates.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina accept the amendment?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the modification.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the resolution the words—

Not already communicated to either House of Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to say, lest I might by some persons be considered as trying to delay the discussion which was about to take place upon another resolution, that I introduced this resolution on the 23d of December; and I have tried, on two or three different occasions, to get it up, but have always been met by objections. I remarked to-day, when I called up the resolution, that I was willing to accept any amendment which would call for additional and proper information, but I was met by the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina, which of course would prevent me from getting the information I sought. Now, since he offers it as an additional amendment calling for additional information, of course I have accepted it with pleasure, as I would have done at first in that shape.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF LADIES TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Missouri pause a single moment? I rise to offer a resolution admitting ladies on the floor of the Senate. There are a great many ladies who have come here to hear this debate. It has often been done before, and I ask that the Doorkeeper be instructed to admit ladies on the floor of the Senate in the lobbies behind Senators' seats.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Doorkeeper be instructed to admit ladies on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. That, I think, requires the unanimous consent of the Senate. Well, sir, upon a former occasion I had the independence to interpose an objection. I know it is a most ungracious position, but I think it is one that I ought to interpose again, and I do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3893) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs;

The bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus—to the Committee on Appropriations; and

The bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874—to the Committee on Finance.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 381) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to be called the Dalles land district; and

An act (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869.

Mr. SCHURZ. I now move that the resolution I offered on Friday last be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I beg the Senate to believe me when I say that I approach this subject in no partisan spirit. About to retire to private station, the success of no party can benefit and the defeat of no party can injure me, except in those interests which I have in common with all American citizens, whose own and whose children's fortunes are bound up in the fortunes of the Republic. I have formed my opinions with deliberation and impartiality, and I shall endeavor to express them in the calmest and most temperate language at my command. The subject is so great that passion or prejudice should certainly have no share in our judgment.

I must confess that the news that came from Louisiana a few days ago has profoundly alarmed me. A thing has happened which never happened in this country before, and which nobody, I trust, ever thought possible.

In the debates of last week it was frequently said that no expression of opinion upon that occurrence would be quite legitimate until an official report setting forth all the details of fact should be before us. I do not quite think so. All the important circumstances of the case have come to our knowledge through a multitude of concurrent statements, among them an elaborate dispatch of General Sheridan, statements from Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Wiltz, and numerous reports in the newspapers of the country, all agreeing upon the essential points. I believe the additional details which still can be furnished will not change the aspect of the case as to its real significance. The facts as they appear are the following:

On the 4th of January the Legislature of Louisiana was to assemble and organize in the State-house of that State. It did so assemble at the time and in the place fixed by law. The State-house was surrounded by armed forces, among them troops of the United States. The Legislature assembled "without any disturbance of the public peace," in the language of General Sheridan. The clerk of the late house of representatives called it to order; he called the roll of its members according to the list furnished by the returning board fixed by law. A legal quorum answered to their names. While the result was being announced, a motion was made by a member, Mr. Bellew, to appoint L. A. Wiltz temporary speaker. That motion was put and declared carried; not, however, by the clerk of the late house. Mr. Wiltz took possession of the chair; the oath of office was administered to him by Justice Houston, and he then administered the oath to the members returned. A motion was made to appoint a certain gentleman clerk and another sergeant-at-arms of the assembly. The motion was put and declared carried. A resolution was then offered to admit the following persons to seats in the Legislature: Charles Schuyler and John Scales, of De Soto Parish; James Brice, jr., of Bienville Parish; C. C. Dunn, of Grant Parish, and George A. Kelly, of the parish of Winn.

The status of these persons was the following: The returning board of Louisiana had declined to pass judgment upon the elections in the parishes named and expressly referred the claims of the five persons whose names I have mentioned to the Legislature itself for adjudication, thus distinctly recognizing the possibility of their being legally elected members of that Legislature. The question on the resolution to seat them was put and declared carried, thus admitting them to seats subject to further contest. They were sworn in.

A motion was made to proceed to the election of permanent officers. L. A. Wiltz was nominated for the speakership by the conservatives, and M. Hahn and C. W. Lowell by the republicans. Mr. Lowell declined. The motion was declared carried. The roll was called, and 55 votes were cast for Mr. Wiltz as speaker, 2 votes for Mr. Hahn, a legal quorum voting, and 14 members, as is reported, not voting at all. Mr. Wiltz was sworn in, and the roll being called the members were sworn in by him at the speaker's stand, among them 5 republican members, Hahn, Baker, Drury, Murrell, and Thomas, who participated in the proceedings. A permanent clerk and sergeant-at-arms were likewise declared elected upon motion. Mr. Wiltz as speaker then announced the house permanently organized and ready for business. Upon the motion of Mr. Dupre, a committee of seven on elections and returns was appointed.

In the mean time considerable disturbance and confusion had arisen in the lobby which the sergeant-at-arms seemed unable to suppress. Mr. Wiltz, the Speaker, then sent for General De Trobriand, of the United States Army, who some time previous had occupied the State-house with his soldiers, and requested him to speak to the disorderly persons in the lobby that a conflict might be prevented. The general did so, and order was restored. The house proceeded then with its business. The committee on elections and returns reported, and upon their report the following persons were seated as members and sworn in: John A. Quinn, of the parish of Avoyelles; J. J. Horan, A. D. Land, and James R. Vaughan, of the parish of Caddo; J. Jeffries, R. L. Luckett, and G. W. Stafford, of the parish of Rapides; and William H. Schwing, of the parish of Iberia. Then, at three o'clock in the afternoon, General De Trobriand, of the United States Army, entered the legislative hall of Louisiana in full uniform, with his sword by his side, and accompanied by two members of his staff and Mr. Vigers, clerk of the late house of representatives; and he exhibited to the gentleman presiding over the house the following documents:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 4.

General DE TROBRIAND, Commanding:

An illegal assembly of men having taken possession of the hall of the house of representatives, and the police not being able to dislodge them, I respectfully request that you will immediately clear the hall and State-house of all persons not returned as legal members of the house of representatives by the returning board of the State.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 4.

General DE TROBRIAND:

The clerk of the house, who has in his possession the roll issued by the secretary of state of legal members of the house of representatives, will point out to you those persons now in the hall of the house of representatives returned by the legal returning board of the State.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of the State.

When these documents were exhibited to him, the chair refused to allow Mr. Vigers to read them to the house and to call the roll of members, so that those designated in Governor Kellogg's letter might be discovered; whereupon General De Trobriand, of the United States Army, had pointed out to him by one Hugh J. Campbell and one T. C. Anderson the persons holding seats to be ejected; and those persons refusing to go out, a file of United States soldiers was brought into action, who with fixed bayonets stood in that legislative hall, seized the persons pointed out to them, and against their protest ejected them by force from their seats in the Legislature of that State. And who were those persons?

When the Legislature convened—and, I repeat, it convened according to law, at the time and in the place fixed by law, called to order by the very officer designated by law—those persons were claimants for seats on the ground of the votes they had received; some of them presenting claims so strong, on the ground of majorities so large, that even such a returning board as Louisiana had did not dare to decide against them; and when they had been seated in the Legislature, organized as I have described, United States soldiers with fixed bayonets decided the case against them and took them out of the legislative hall by force. When that had been done the conservative members left that hall in a body with a solemn protest. The United States soldiery kept possession of it; and then, under their protection, the republicans organized the Legislature to suit themselves.

This is what happened in the State-house of Louisiana on the 4th day of January.

Sir, there is one thing which every free people living under a constitutional government watches with peculiar jealousy as the most essential safeguard of representative institutions. It is the absolute freedom of legislative bodies from interference on the part of executive power, especially by force. Therefore, in a truly constitutional government, may the proceedings of the Legislature be good or ever so bad, is such interference, especially as concerns the admission of its own members, most emphatically condemned and most carefully guarded against, whether it proceed from a governor or from a president or from a king, under whatever circumstances, on whatever pretexts. And whenever such interference is successfully carried out, it is always, and justly, looked upon as a sure sign of the decline of free institutions.

There is another thing which especially the American people hold sacred as the life element of their republican freedom: It is the right to govern and administer their local affairs independently through the exercise of that self-government which lives and has its being in the organism of the States; and therefore we find in the Constitution of the Republic the power of the National Government to interfere in State affairs most scrupulously limited to certain well-defined cases and the observance of certain strictly-prescribed forms; and if these limitations be arbitrarily disregarded by the national authority, and if such violation be permitted by the Congress of the United States, we shall surely have reason to say that our system of republican government is in danger.

We are by the recent events in Louisiana forced to inquire how the cause of local self-government and of legislative privilege stands in the United States to-day. Before laying their hands upon things so important, so sacred, the authorities should certainly have well assured themselves that they have the clearest, the most obvious, the most unequivocal, the most unquestionable warrant of law. Where, I ask, is that warrant? In the Constitution of the United States we find but one sentence referring to the subject. It says in the fourth section of the fourth article:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

So far the Constitution. There are two statutes prescribing the mode in which this is to be done, one passed in 1795 and the other in 1807. The former provides that "in case of insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) to call upon the militia of other States to suppress the insurrection." The statute of 1807 authorizes the President to employ the regular Army and Navy for the same purpose, provided, however, that he "has first observed all the prerequisites of the law."

Had in this case the circumstances so described occurred, and were "all the prerequisites of the law" observed? There had been an insurrection in Louisiana on the 14th of September, 1874, an insurrection against the State government recognized by the President of the United States. That State government had been overthrown by the insurgents. The President, having been called upon by Acting Governor Kellogg, issued his proclamation commanding the insurgents to desist. They did so desist at once, and the Kellogg government was restored without a struggle, and has not been attacked since. The insurrection, as such, was totally ended. On the 4th of January nobody pretends that there was any insurrection. The State of Louisiana was quiet. The State-house was surrounded by the armed forces of Governor Kellogg. Those forces were not resisted; their services were not even called into requisition. There was certainly no demand upon the President for military interference by the Legislature; neither was there by the governor "in case the Legislature could not be convened," for the Legislature did convene without any obstruction at the time and in the place fixed by law, and was called to order by the officer designated by law. And yet, there being neither insurrection nor domestic violence, there being neither a call for military interference upon the President by the Legislature nor by the governor "in case the Legislature could not be convened," there being, therefore, not the faintest shadow of an observance of "all the prerequisites of the law" as defined in the statute, the troops of the United States proceeded, not against an insurrection, not against a body of men committing domestic violence, but against a legislative body sitting in the State-house; and the soldiers of the United States were used to execute an order from the governor determining what persons should sit in that Legislature as its members and what persons should be ejected. I solemnly ask what provision is there in the Constitution, what law is there on the statute-book furnishing a warrant for such a proceeding?

It is said in extenuation of the interference of the military power of the United States in Louisiana that the persons ejected from that Legislature by the Federal soldiers were not legally-elected members of that body. Suppose that had been so—but that is not the question. The question is where is the constitutional principle, where is the law authorizing United States soldiers, with muskets in their hands, to determine who is a legally-elected member of a State Legislature and who is not?

It is said that the mode of organizing that Legislature was not in accordance with the statutes of the State. Suppose that had been so; but that is not the question. The question is where is the constitutional or legal warrant for the bayonets of the Federal soldiery to interpret the statutes of a State as against the Legislature of that State, and to decide in and for the Legislature a point of parliamentary law?

It is said that the governor requested the aid of United States soldiers to purge the Legislature of members he styled illegal. That may be so; but that is not the question. The question is, where is the law authorizing United States soldiers to do the bidding of a State governor who presumes to decide what members sitting in a Legislature regularly convened at the time and place fixed by law are legally elected members?

It is said the trouble was threatening between contending parties in Louisiana. Suppose that had been so; but that is not the question. The question is, where is the law from which the National Government, in case of threatening trouble in a State, derives its power to invade the legislative body of that State by armed force, and to drag out persons seated there as members, that others may take their places? Where is that law, I ask? You will search the Constitution, you will search the statutes in vain.

I cannot, therefore, escape from the deliberate conviction, a conviction conscientiously formed, that the deed done on the 4th of January in the State-house of the State of Louisiana by the military forces of the United States constitutes a gross and manifest violation of the Constitution and the laws of this Republic. We have an act before us indicating a spirit in our Government which either ignores the Constitution and the laws, or so interprets them that they cease to be the safeguard of the independence of legislation and of the rights and liberties of our people. And that spirit shows itself in a shape more alarming still in the instrument the Executive has chosen to execute his behests.

Sir, no American citizen can have read without profound regret and equally profound apprehension the recent dispatch of General Sheridan to the Secretary of War, in which he suggests that a numerous class of citizens should by the wholesale be outlawed as banditti by a mere proclamation of the President, to be turned over to him as a military chief, to meet at his hands swift justice by the verdict of a military commission. Nobody respects General Sheridan more than I do for the brilliancy of his deeds on the field of battle; the nation has delighted to honor his name. But the same nation would sincerely deplore to see the hero of the ride of Winchester and of the charge at the Five Forks stain that name by an attempt to ride over the laws and the Constitution of the country, and to charge upon the liberties of his fellow-citizens. The policy he has proposed is so appalling, that every American citizen who loves his liberty stands aghast at the mere possibility of such a suggestion being addressed to the President of the United States by a high official of the Government. It is another illustration how great a man may be as a soldier, and how conspicuously unable to understand what civil law and what a constitution mean; how glorious in fighting for you, and how little fit to govern you! And yet General Sheridan is not only kept in Louisiana as the instrument of the Executive will, but after all that has happened encouraged by the emphatic approval of the executive branch of this Government.

I repeat, sir, all these things have alarmed me, and it seems not me alone. In all parts of the country the press is giving voice to the same feeling, and what I learn by private information convinces me that the press is by no means exaggerating the alarm of the people. On all sides you can hear the question asked, "If this can be done in Louisiana, and if such things be sustained by Congress, how long will it be before it can be done in Massachusetts and in Ohio? How long before the constitutional rights of all the States and the self-government of all the people may be trampled under foot? How long before a general of the Army may sit in the chair you occupy, sir, to decide contested-election cases for the purpose of manufacturing a majority in the Senate? How long before a soldier may stalk into the national House of Representatives, and, pointing to the Speaker's mace, say, 'Take away that bauble?'"

Mr. President, these fears may appear wild and exaggerated, and perhaps they are; and yet these are the feelings you will hear expressed when the voice of the people penetrates to you. But I ask you, my associates in this body, in all soberness, can you tell me what will be impossible to-morrow if this was possible yesterday? Who is there among us who but three years ago would have expected to be called upon to justify the most gross and unjustifiable usurpation of Judge Durell and the President's enforcement of it as the legitimate and lawful origin of a State government? And who of you, when permitting that to be done, would have expected to see the United States soldiery marched into the hall of a State Legislature to decide its organization? Permit that to-day, and who of you can tell me what we shall be called upon, nay, what we may be forced to permit to-morrow?

You cannot but feel that we have arrived at a crisis in our affairs, and I will not conceal from you that I cannot contemplate that crisis without grave apprehension; for what has happened already makes me look forward with anxiety to what may be still in store for us. We are evidently—and I say it with calmness and deliberation—on the downward slope, and the question is where shall we land. It is not, indeed, the success of any Napoleonic ambitions in this country that I fear, for if such ambitions existed they would still have an American and not a French people to encounter. But what I do see reason to fear if we continue on our course is this: that our time-honored constitutional principles will be gradually obliterated by repeated abuses of power establishing themselves as precedents; that the machinery of administration may become more and more a mere instrument of "ring" rule, a tool to manufacture majorities and to organize plunder; and that finally, in the hollow shell of republican forms, this Government will become the mere foot-ball of rapacious and despotic factions. That, sir, is what I do fear.

Let us see how the drift of things has carried us on in that direction. I must confess I have long considered our policy concerning the South as one fraught with great danger, not only danger to the South but danger to the whole Republic. I have therefore opposed it step by step and warned you of its inevitable consequences. I know full well that southern society has been, and in a measure is, disturbed by violent tendencies and by deplorable, sometimes bloody disorders. I have never denied it, and nobody has more earnestly condemned and denounced those disorders than I. Time and again have I appealed to all patriotic men in the South to use their utmost efforts to secure peace, order, and public safety among their people. Those disorders I would be the last man now to palliate or excuse; but I also believe that they were in a great measure the offspring of circumstances and to be expected.

When the war closed a great revolution had suddenly transformed, among general distress and confusion, the whole organism of southern society. Not only was that system of labor uprooted with which the southern people had for centuries considered their whole productive wealth and prosperity identified, but by the enfranchisement of the colored people, that class of society which had just emerged from slavery, with all its ignorance, (and let me say for that ignorance they were by no means themselves responsible,) was suddenly clothed with political power, and in some States with overruling political power. That power was called into play at a time when, after the sweeping destruction and desolation of the war, the South was most in need of a wise co-operation of all its social forces to heal its wounds and to lift it up from its terrible prostration.

Surely, sir, the justice of the constitutional amendments, designed to secure to the slave his freedom and to enable the colored people to maintain their rights through active participation in the functions of self-government, I shall be the last man to question, for I aided in passing them. Neither is that the legitimate subject of this debate. But as all these tremendous transformations came at a time when the turbulence of armed conflicts had scarcely subsided, when ancient prejudices had not yet cooled, when the bitterness of the war was still fresh, and when the hope of other solutions was still lingering among the southern people, it was most deplorable indeed, but not at all surprising, that great disorders should have occurred. No such changes have ever been made in any free country without such disorders; and it was the business of statesmanship to deal with them. It was a great problem, and perhaps the most critical in the history of this country, for it was to overcome resistance and disturbance by means sufficiently effectual without at the same time developing an arbitrary spirit of power dangerous to our free institutions.

When the constitutional amendments fixing the results of the war and the status of the different classes of society had become assured, there were two methods presenting themselves to you to accomplish that end. One was suggested by the very nature of republican institutions. It was to trust the discovery and the development of the remedies for existing evils, as soon as the nature of circumstances would permit, to that agency upon which, after all, our republican Government must depend for its vitality, namely, the self-government of the people in the States. It was to inspire that local self-government with healthy tendencies by doing all within your power to make the southern people, not only those who had profited by the great revolution in acquiring their freedom, but also those who had suffered from it, reasonably contented in their new situation. Such a policy required an early and complete removal of all those political disabilities which restrained a large and influential number of white people from a direct participation in the government of their local affairs, while the colored people were exercising it. That policy did, indeed, not preclude the vigorous execution of constitutional and just laws; and you will not understand me as thus designating all the laws that were made; but it did preclude the employment of the powers conferred by such laws for purposes of a partisan color calculated to impeach the impartiality of the National Government and thus to injure its moral authority. It did preclude, above all things, every unconstitutional stretch of interference, which by its insidious example is always calculated to encourage and excite a lawless and revolutionary spirit among all classes of society. That policy required that the National Government in all its branches should have sternly discountenanced the adventurers and blood-suckers who preyed upon the southern people, so as not to appear as their ally and protector. It required a conscientious employment of all those moral influences which the National Government had at its command. It was natural, in the distress and confusion which followed the war, that the southern people, white as well as black, should have turned their eyes to the National Government for aid and guidance; and that aid and guidance might have been given, not in impeding and baffling, but in encouraging self-government to fulfill its highest aims and duties. Every Federal office in the South should have been carefully filled with the very wisest and the very best man that could be discovered for it. Nowhere in the vast boundaries of this Republic was the personal character of the Federal officer of higher importance, for being clothed by his very connection with the National Government with extraordinary moral authority, every one of them could without undue interference with local concerns, by the very power of his advice and example, make that moral influence most beneficially felt among all his surroundings.

Sir, I am not sanguine enough to believe that if such a policy had been followed local self-government would at once have made every Southern State a perfect model of peace and order. I know it would not; but it is my solemn conviction that it would have been infinitely more productive of good, it would have been infinitely more effective in gradually developing a satisfactory state of things than all your force laws, all the efforts of Government officers to maintain their party ascendency, all the usurpations and military interferences in the same direction. And above all things, such a policy would have left those principles intact which are the life of constitutional government. It would have spared us such a painful spectacle as that which we are to-day beholding in Louisiana. It would have relieved the American people of the anxious inquiry you hear on all sides to-day, "What is now to become of the character of our republican government?" It was the policy naturally suggested by the teachings of our institutions; it was the true republican, American policy.

But there presented itself to you also another method of dealing with the violent and disorderly tendencies in the South. It was, whenever and wherever a disturbance occurred, to use at once brute force in sufficient strength to repress it; to employ every means to keep in every State your partisans in place, and to trample down all opposition, no matter what stretch of power it might require, no matter what constitutional restriction of authority might have to be broken through. Such a method, if supported by a military force sufficiently strong, may also be made quite effective, for a time at least. Thus you might have brought every malefactor in the South to swift justice. Wherever three of your opponents met, you might have styled them an unlawful combination of banditti, and had the offenders promptly punished. You might have maintained in governmental power in the South whomsoever of your party you liked. You might have made every colored man perfectly safe, not only in the exercise of his franchise but in everything else. You might have struck with terror not only the evil-doers but honest persons also, all over the land. You might have made the National Government so strong that, right or wrong, nobody could resist it.

This is also an effective method to keep peace and order, and it works admirably well as long as it lasts. It is employed with singular success in Russia, and may be in other countries. But, sir, if you by such means had secured the safety of those who were disturbed or considered in danger, would you not, after all, have asked yourselves what has in the mean time become of the liberties and rights of all of us? That method would have been effective for its purpose, but it would have been a cruel stroke of irony after all this to call this still a republic.

I do not mean to insinuate to you, republican Senators, that you wanted to do that. I know you did not. You did not intend to employ such means, and you would have recoiled from such a result. You tried a middle course. You respected the self-government of the States in point of form; but while you and the Executive omitted to use all those moral influences which would have inspired that self-government with the healthy tendencies I spoke of, you did make laws conferring upon the National Government dangerous powers and of very doubtful constitutionality; at least that was my conviction, and I opposed them. The effect was very deplorable in several ways. Look around you and contemplate what followed. Your partisans in the Southern States, and among them the greediest and corruptest of the kind, began to look up to Congress and the National Executive as their natural allies and sworn protectors, bound to sustain them in power under whatever circumstances. Every vagabond in the South calling himself a republican thought himself entitled to aid from you when rushing up to Congress with an outrage story. The colored people began to think that you were bound to aid them in whatever they might do, instead of depending upon a prudent and honest use of their own political rights to establish their own position. The Federal office-holders in the South became more than ever the center of partisan intrigue and trickery. The Caseys and Packards carried off State senators in United States revenue-cutters, and held republican conventions in United States custom-houses, guarded by United States soldiers, to prevent other republican factions from interfering. Nay, more than that, the same Packard, during the last election campaign in Louisiana, being at the same time United States marshal and chairman of Kellogg's campaign committee, managing not only the political campaign but also the movements of the United States dragoons to enforce the laws and to keep his political opponents from "intimidating" his political friends. More than that, in one State after another in the South we saw enterprising politicians start rival legislatures and rival governments, much in the way of Mexican pronunciamentos, calculating on the aid to be obtained from the National Government; the Attorney-General of the United States called upon to make or unmake governors of States by the mere wave of his hand, and the Department of Justice almost appearing like the central bureau for the regulation of State elections. And still more than that, we saw a Feberal judge in Louisiana, by a midnight order, universally recognized as a gross and most unjustifiable usurpation, virtually making a State government and Legislature, and the National Executive with the Army sustaining that usurpation and Congress permitting it to be done.

And now the culminating glory to-day—I do not know whether it will be the culminating glory to-morrow: Federal soldiers with fixed bayonets marching into the legislative hall of a State and invading the Legislature assembled in the place and at the time fixed by law, dragging out of the body by force men universally recognized as claimants for membership, and having been seated; soldiers deciding contested-election cases and organizing a legislative body; the Lieutenant-General suggesting to the President to outlaw by proclamation a numerous class of people by the wholesale that he may try them by drum-head court-martial, and then the Secretary of War informing the Lieutenant-General by telegraph that "all of us," the whole Government, have full confidence in his judgment and wisdom. And after all this the whites of the South gradually driven to look upon the National Government as their implacable and unscrupulous enemy, and the people of the whole country full of alarm and anxiety about the safety of republican institutions and the rights of every man in the land.

Ah, Senators, you did not mean this, I trust; but there it is. Not a single one of these things has happened without exciting in your hearts an emotion of regret and anxiety, and the wish that nothing similar should come again; but you followed step by step, reluctantly, very reluctantly, perhaps, but you followed, and you know not where you may have to go unless now at last you make a stand. You did not mean this. You meant only to protect colored men in their rights, and to this end to keep your friends in power. You did not mean to do it by the Russian method, but from small beginnings something has grown up, something that is of near kin to it. A few steps further and you may have the whole. Senators, if you do not mean to go on, then I say to you it is the highest time to turn back. It will not do to permit such things to be done as we now behold, without rebuke and resistance, for to permit them is to urge them on.

I have heard it said here that he who justifies murders in the South is the accomplice of the murderer. Be it so; but consider also that he who in a place like ours fails to stop, or even justifies a blow at the fundamental laws of the land, makes himself the accomplice of those who strike at the life of the Republic and at the liberties of the people.

Above all things, gentlemen, indulge in no delusions as to the consequences of your doings. Be bold enough to look this great question for one moment squarely in the face. If you really think that the peace and order of society in this country can no longer be maintained through the self-government of the people under the Constitution and the impartial enforcement of constitutional laws; if you really think that this old machinery of free government can no longer be trusted with its most important functions, and that such transgressions on the part of those in power as now pass before us are right and necessary for the public welfare, then, gentlemen, admit that this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people is a miscarriage. Admit that the hundredth anniversary of this Republic must be the confession of its failure, and make up your minds to change the form as well as the nature of our institutions; for to play at republic longer would then be a cruel mockery. But I entreat you, do not delude yourselves and others with the thought that by following the fatal road upon which we now are marching you can still preserve those institutions; for I tell you, and the history of struggling mankind bears me out, where the forms of constitutional government can be violated with impunity, there the spirit of constitutional government will soon be dead. Who does not know that republics will be sometimes the theater of confusion, disturbance, and violent transgressions; more frequently, perhaps, than monarchies governed by strong despotic rule. The citizens of a republic have to pay some price for the great boon of their common liberty. But do we not know, also, or have we despaired of it, that in a republic remedies for such evils can be found in entire consonance with the spirit and form of republican institutions and of constitutional government? Let nobody suspect me of favoring or excusing disorder or violent transgressions; nothing could be further from me. But I have not despaired of the efficiency of our republican institutions. I insist that they do furnish effective remedies for existing evils.

But, sir, pusillanimous indeed and dangerous to republican institutions is that statesmanship which, to repress transgressions and secure the safety of some, can devise only such means as by violating constitutional principles will endanger the liberty of all. You say that it is one of the first duties of the Government to protect the lives, the property, and the rights of the citizen, and so it is; but it is also the first duty of a constitutional government carefully to abstain from employing for that protection such means as will in the end place the lives and property and rights of the citizens at the mercy of arbitrary power. Let a policy forgetting this great obligation be adopted and followed, and free institutions will soon be on the downward road in this country, as they have been before to-day in so many others. Have we read the history of the downfall of republics in vain? It teaches us a most intelligible and a fearful lesson. It is this: usurpers or blunderers in power pretend that the safety and order of society cannot be maintained by measures within the form of constitution and law, and lawyers employ their wit to justify usurpation by quibbling on technicalities or by pleading the necessities of the case. What first appears as an isolated and comparatively harmless fact is by repetition developed into a system, and there is the end of constitutional government.

Let us not close our ears to the teachings of centuries, for if we do a repentance of centuries may be in vain.

I repeat, republican institutions and self-government have remedies to right the wrongs occurring, and if left to their legitimate action, they will prove far more efficient to that end than the arbitrary measures we are now witnessing. What is it, I ask republican Senators, that you desire to accomplish in the South? Being honest patriots, having only the welfare of the people and not selfish partisan advantage at heart, you will desire this: that in the South peace and order should prevail and that every citizen may be protected in his life and property and rights, and that to this end a patriotic and enlightened public sentiment should develop itself strong enough to prevent or repress violence and crime through the ordinary ways of legal self-government; and if this be accomplished, no matter under what partisan auspices it be, then every good citizen, every patriot, will have reason to rejoice.

Look at the condition of the Southern States. I well remember the time, not a great many years ago, when the State of Virginia was said to be in so alarming a condition—and I remember prominent republicans of that State hanging around this body to convince us of it—that in case the conservatives should obtain control of the State government the streets and fields of Virginia would run with blood. So it was predicted of North Carolina, and so of Georgia; and, indeed, I deny it not, there were very lamentable disorders in many of those States during the first years after the war. Now, sir, what was the remedy? You remember what policy was urged with regard to Georgia. It was to prolong the existence of Governor Bullock's legislature for two years beyond its constitutional term, to strengthen the power of that Governor Bullock, that champion plunderer of Georgia, who not long afterward had to run from the clutches of justice; and unless that were done it was loudly predicted upon this floor there would be a carnival of crime and a sea of blood!

Well, sir, it was not done. The people of those States gradually recovered the free exercise of their self-government, and what has been the result? Virginia is to-day as quiet and orderly a State as she ever was, I think fully as quiet and orderly as most other States, and every citizen is securely enjoying his rights. And who will deny that in North Carolina and Georgia an improvement has taken place, standing in most glaring contrast with the fearful predictions made by the advocates of Federal interference? And that most healthy improvement is sustained in those States under and by the self-government of the people thereof. This is a matter of history, unquestioned and unquestionable. And that improvement will proceed further under the same self-government of the people as society becomes more firmly settled in its new conditions and as it is by necessity led to recognize more clearly the dependence of its dearest interests on the maintenance of public order and safety. That is the natural development of things.

It will help the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] little to say that, with all this, the republican vote has greatly fallen off in Georgia, and that this fact is conclusive proof of a general system of intimidation practiced upon the negroes there. It is scarcely worth while that I should repeat here the unquestionably truthful statement which has been made, that the falling off of the negro vote is in a great measure accounted for by the non-payment of the colored people of the school tax upon which their right to vote depended. I might add that perhaps the same causes which brought forth a considerable falling off in the republican vote in a great many other States, such as Indiana and Massachusetts and New York, produced the same result in Georgia also, and that the same motives which produced a change in the political attitude of whites may have acted also upon the blacks. Is not this possible? Why not? But I ask you, sir, what kind of logic, what statesmanship is it we witness so frequently on this floor, which takes the statistics of population of a State in hand and then proceeds to reason thus: So many colored people, so many white, therefore so many colored votes and so many white votes; and therefore so many republican votes and so many democratic votes; and if an election does not show this exact proposition, it must be necessarily the result of fraud and intimidation and the National Government must interfere. When we have established the rule that election returns must be made or corrected according to the statistics of population, then we may decide elections beforehand by the United States census and last year's Tribune Almanac, and save ourselves the trouble of voting.

Intimidation of voters! I doubt not, sir, there has been much of it, very much. There has been much of it by terrorism, physical and moral, much by the discharge of employés from employment for political cause, but, I apprehend, not all on one side. I shall be the last man on earth to say a word of excuse for the southern ruffian who threatens a negro voter with violence to make him vote the conservative ticket. I know no language too severe to condemn his act. But I cannot forget, and it stands vividly in my recollection, that the only act of terrorism and intimidation I ever happened to witness with my own eyes was the cruel clubbing and stoning of a colored man in North Carolina in 1872 by men of his own race, because he had declared himself in favor of the conservatives; and if the whole story of the South were told it would be discovered that such a practice has by no means been infrequent.

But there was intimidation of another kind.

I cannot forget the spectacle of Marshal Packard, with the dragoons of the United States at the disposition of the chairman of the Kellogg campaign committee at the late election in Louisiana, riding through the State with a full assortment of warrants in his hands, arresting whomsoever he listed. I cannot forget that as to the discharge of laborers from employment for political cause a most seductive and demoralizing example is set by the very highest authority in the land. While we have a law on our statute-book declaring the intimidation of voters by threatened or actual discharge from employment a punishable offense, it is the notorious practice of the Government of the United States to discharge every one of its employés who dares to vote against the administration party; and that is done North and South, East and West, as far as the arm of that Government reaches. I have always condemned the intimidation of voters in every shape, and therefore I have been in favor of a genuine civil-service reform. But while your National Government is the chief intimidator in the land, you must not be surprised if partisans on both sides profit a little from its example.

Nor do I think that the intimidation which deters a colored man from voting with the opposition against the republican party is less detestable or less harmful to the colored men themselves than that which threatens him as a republican. I declare I shall hail the day as a most auspicious one for the colored race in the South, when they cease to stand as a solid mass under the control and discipline of one political organization, thus being arrayed as a race against another race; when they throw off the scandalous leadership of those adventurers who, taking advantage of their ignorance, make them the tools of their rapacity, and thus throw upon them the odium for their misdeeds; when they begin to see the identity of their own true interests with the interests of the white people among whom they have to live; when they begin to understand that they greatly injure those common interests by using the political power they possess for the elevation to office of men, black or white, whose ignorance or unscrupulousness unfits them for responsible trust; when freely, according to the best individual judgment of each man, they divide their votes between the different political parties and when thus giving to each party a chance to obtain their votes, they make it the interest and the natural policy of each party to protect their safety and respect their rights in order to win their votes. I repeat what I once said in another place: not in union is there safety, but in division. Whenever the colored voters shall have become an important element, not only in one, but in both political parties, then both parties under an impulse of self interest will rival in according them the fullest protection. I may speak here of my own peculiar experience, for they may learn a lesson from the history of the adopted citizens of this country. I remember the time when they stood in solid mass on the side of one party, and schemes dangerous to their rights were hatched upon the side of the other. When both parties obtained an important share of their votes, both hoping for more, both became equally their friends. This will be the development in the South, and a most fortunate one for the colored people. It has commenced in the States I have already mentioned, where self-government goes its way unimpeded, and I fervently hope the frantic partisan efforts to prevent it in others will not much longer prevail. I hope this as a sincere and devoted friend of the colored race.

But the Senator from Indiana may say that will bring about a still greater falling-off in the republican vote. Ah, sir, it may; but do you not profess to be sincerely solicitous for the safety and rights of the colored man? Are not some of you even willing to see the most essential principles of constitutional government invaded, to see State governments set up by judicial usurpation, and State Legislatures organized by Federal bayonets only that the colored man may be safe? Gentlemen, you can have that much cheaper if you let the colored man protect himself by the method I advise. The colored people will then be far safer than under a broken Constitution; the peace and order of society will be far more naturally and securely established than under the fitful interference of military force. And that can be accomplished by permitting the self-government of the people to have its course. But the republican vote may thus fall off. That is true. The party may suffer. Indeed it may. But, Senators, I, for my part, know of no party, whatever its name or fame, so sacred that its selfish advantage should be considered superior to the peace and order of society and good understanding among the people. I do not hesitate to say that I prefer the conservative government of Virginia to the republican government of Louisiana; and, if I mistake not, an overwhelming majority of the American people are of the same opinion.

I ask you what would you have made of Georgia had you forced upon its neck, as seemed to be desired by some, the yoke of the Bullocks and the Foster Blodgets? What would have become of Virginia and North Carolina if a Federal judge, by an act of usurpation like Durell's, had set up republican State governments for them, and the President had enforced the usurpation with the bayonets of the Army? Where now you observe the steady growth of peace and order and a fruitful co-operation of the social elements there would be bloody conflicts of infuriated factions, a society torn to pieces by deadly feuds, a prosperity utterly prostrate. That would have been the result; but then you might have had republican government in those States!

I ask you in all candor, republican Senators, is that what you want? If you do, I am sure the patriotism of the American people is not with you.

O, it is indeed time we should understand that in this Republic we cannot serve the cause of law and order if we in our representative place do not respect the law and if we permit the Government to violate it without hinderance. Every lawless act of those in power, professedly intended to preserve peace and order, will most surely produce to the cause of peace and order its greatest danger. You want all the people of the South, and especially of Louisiana, to become law-abiding citizens; and yet, to make them so, the national authority has imposed upon them a government which is the offspring confessedly of gross judicial usurpation and revolutionary proceedings. How can you expect them to refrain from revolutionary acts after the Government itself has set them this revolutionary example? How can you fill them with reverence for the sanctity of the laws, if you show them that the laws have no sanctity for you?

The people of the South are not a people of murderers and banditti. Only the most morbid fanaticism of partisanship will call them so. There are, I know, bad elements among them, and you blame the better classes of society for not putting down these bad elements by their own efforts. But is not the National Government itself, by resorting to usurpation and unconstitutional proceedings, giving to those bad elements in southern society a strength which otherwise they never would possess, enabling even the ruffian to throw himself into the attitude of a defender of constitutional government against revolutionary usurpation?

You speak of protecting the negro. Woe to the negroes of the South if, after their unscrupulous leaders have done so much already to identify them with organized corruption and rapacity, you now, by employing or sanctioning unconstitutional means for their protection, identify them also with the overthrow of constitutional principles and contempt for the laws of the land! Such measures to protect them will by their very effects put them in the greatest jeopardy. Their most cruel enemies could not inflict on them an injury more cruel than this.

Let me warn you, Senators, that you stand upon dangerous ground; for if such things as have been done in Louisiana are sustained by the republican majority in Congress, and as one evil deed always gives birth to another, if so high-handed a course be continued, you are taking upon yourselves a responsibility the extent of which it is difficult to measure. Do not treat with contempt, I beseech you, what is now going on in the public mind. I hold here in my hand an extract which I clipped from one of the republican papers of the North, and I will read to you its language:

> Unless the republican party is content to be swept out of existence by the storm of indignant protest arising against the wrongs of Louisiana from all portions of the country, it will see that this most shameful outrage is redressed wholly and at once; for if it is right for the Federal soldiery to pack the Legislature of one State in the manner the Attorney-General declares it shall be packed, or if it can be done, it is right and can be done in any other State. It is a matter that concerns Massachusetts, California, and Pennsylvania equally with Louisiana: for it is an act of Federal usurpation which, if not revoked and condemned by Congress, will lead inevitably to the destruction of the whole fabric of our Government.
> What adds to the common indignation against the perpetrators of the wrong is the moral heroism exhibited by the disfranchised people of Louisiana, who have borne with sublime patience and peace that which was excuse sufficient for revolution; for the doctrine is as old as wrong itself that usurpation of the people's rights makes revolution not only a privilege, but makes it a duty.

Mr. SARGENT. What paper does the Senator read from?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Philadelphia Inquirer of the 6th of this month.

Mr. SARGENT. A republican paper?

Mr. SCHURZ. It is about as republican as most republican papers are nowadays all over the country. [Laughter.] When such sentiments, appealing directly to the right of revolution, are expressed by loyal republican journals in the North, they are not unlikely to be put forth in stronger language by opposition journals in the South. The growth of such feelings I cannot look upon without grave apprehension, not as to the spirit of justice and freedom which they demonstrate, but as to the dreadful consequences which they might produce if rashly acted upon. And if my voice could reach so far as to be heard by the people of Louisiana, I would say to them, "Take good care not a single moment to permit any impulse of passion to run away with your judgment. Whatever injustice you may have to suffer, let not a hand of yours be lifted, let no provocation of insolent power nor any tempting opportunity seduce you into the least demonstration of violence; for if you do, no human foresight can tell what advantage may be taken of your rashness and in what dangers and disasters it may involve, not only you, but the whole Republic. As your cause is just, trust to its justice, for surely the time cannot be far when every American who truly loves his liberty will recognize the cause of his own rights and liberties in the cause of constitutional government in Louisiana, and that rising spirit, by a peaceful victory, will bury the usurpers under a crushing load of universal condemnation." That I would say to them.

Indeed, Senators, that prediction cannot fail to become true. Do not indulge in vain delusions; do not lay the flattering unction to your souls that the cry of blood and murder or new budgets of atrocities in official reports, such as General Sheridan promises, will divert the public mind from the true question at issue. That cry and such reports begin to fall stale upon the ear of the people; not as if the people had become indifferent as to the wrongs perpetrated in any part of the country upon any class of citizens, but because the people have lost their former confidence in the sincerity and truthfulness of those who parade the bloody stories with the greatest ostentation. And why has that confidence declined? Because too many exaggerations have been discovered in the statements so frequently made, and because in many instances it became somewhat too glaringly apparent that the blood and murder cry was used as convenient partisan stage-thunder merely to catch votes. The people have begun shrewdly to suspect that when some men pretend they must remain in power to protect the lives of the negroes, the cry about murdered negroes must be raised simply to keep them in power.

But there is another and more important reason why this cry will be distrusted now. The people are asking themselves—and well they may—whether the very policy which is followed professedly to prevent such outrages is not in itself well calculated to serve as the cause for more. They look at Virginia, at North Carolina, at Georgia, and they find that the self-government of the people, unobstructed, is gradually but steadily advancing those States in peace, order, good feeling, and prosperity. They look at Louisiana, and find the self-government of the people obstructed and hear of turmoil and conflict. They do not fail to conclude that the forcing of Bullock and Foster Blodgett upon Georgia would have reduced that State to the same unhappy condition which in Louisiana the usurpation of Kellogg has brought forth. Looking, then, at that picture and at this, they begin wisely to make up their minds to the fact that after all the Southern States can now give to themselves better government than Federal interference can impose upon them.

But, still more, the people have begun to understand, and it is indeed high time they should understand, that the means professedly used to prevent and suppress outrages are producing far worse fruit than the outrages themselves; that—and hear what I say—the lawlessness of power is becoming far more dangerous to all than the lawlessness of the mob. Therefore, I think Senators most seriously deceive themselves if they think the blood and murder cry can deceive the people about the nature of the usurpations of power we have now to deal with.

Neither do I think that you can convince an intelligent public opinion that the Kellogg party did carry the State of Louisiana by a bona fide vote at the last election, and that the unconstitutional employment of the Federal bayonets was merely to vindicate the true will of the people of Louisiana lawfully expressed at the polls. No intelligent man can have escaped the impression that those who executed the barefaced usurpation of 1872 would not shrink from any device, ever so foul, to preserve the fruits of that usurpation by repeating the game in 1874. It was noticed with general astonishment (and I have to refer to that case once more, for it stands out as one of the most repulsive things in the history of our politics) that a Federal officer, United States Marshal Packard, was permitted to manage the political campaign as the chairman of the Kellogg State central committee and at the same time the operations of United States soldiers in arresting his opponents, a combination of functions so strikingly suspicious, so glaringly unfair, that when I publicly called attention to it even a large number of republican journals protested against it as an outrage upon public decency. It has not been overlooked that when, after the insurrection of the 14th of September, arrangements were attempted in Louisiana to divest the returning board of its suspicious partisan character, the leading members of the Kellogg party most strenuously objected to the admission of an equal number of conservatives and republicans, with one man of unimpeachable character to be chosen by them jointly to act as umpire in the return of the votes, thus insisting for themselves upon the privilege to count the votes as they might choose. It has been well observed that, the returning board having purposely preserved its partisan character when the election showed a considerable conservative majority, manipulated the returns for weeks and weeks, until, by hook or crook, that conservative majority was transformed into a republican one. It has not escaped public attention that the Attorney-General of the United States, with ostentatious publicity, declared his purpose to stand by that returning board whatever it might do, thus encouraging it boldly to go on; and when the thing was done, declared himself for a "heroic policy" to enforce its edicts, and whereupon followed the military interference.

In view of all these things and of other information that has come within my reach, I declare it here as my solemn conviction, that the conservatives of Louisiana did fairly carry the late election by a considerable majority of votes; that they were defrauded by the returning board of the result of that election; and that the soldiers of the United States, when they invaded the Legislature of Louisiana, did not vindicate but trampled under the heels of lawless force the true will of the people, lawfully expressed at the polls. That is my honest conviction, and if common report speaks truly—and I may mention that common report without transgressing parliamentary rules—the members of the congressional committee who were sent down to Louisiana to make investigation, as they are honorable and truthful men—a majority of them republicans but no abject tools of party dictation—will tell Congress and the country, perhaps this very day, as the result of their conscientious investigation, that the conservatives of Louisiana did fairly carry that election; that the returning board did defraud them of its result; and that the will of the people of Louisiana lawfully expressed has been crushed out under the heel of a lawless military invasion. That, gentlemen, the country will hear, and that the American people will believe as the honest truth told by honest men.

No, Senators, do not deceive yourselves; no man will be permitted to obscure the great constitutional question before us with flimsy side issues; for from whatever point of view you may contemplate it, every consideration of law, of moral right, of justice, of public policy, of the common welfare, puts the deed done in Louisiana only into a stronger light as a lawless transgression of arbitrary power pregnant with wrong and disaster. We must face that question, and as we are men with the responsibility of guardians of the Constitution and laws upon us, we must face it boldly. This, it seems to me, if ever, is the time when the patriot should rise above the partisan.

I have heard it whispered that some of the eminent lawyers of this body will still endeavor to find some technical plea by which to show that the intrusion of the soldier in organizing the legislative body of Louisiana was in some way justifiable under the Constitution and laws of this Republic. If it be so, then I appeal to them to consider well what they are attempting to do. Surely I desire no injustice to be done to any man, high or low. If there be a clear justification of such an act, which I have not seen—and I solemnly declare I am not able to see one—let it be brought forward. If there be one, then I shall deplore that the Constitution and laws of this Republic are so defective in their most essential aims as to sanction an exercise of arbitrary power which in no free country on the face of the globe would be admitted a single moment. If there be such a justification, then I shall think it high time to urge such a change of the laws that they may effectually protect the independence of Legislatures and the liberty of the citizen, for otherwise neither will be safe. But, sir, if there be no such justification, clear as sunlight, and palpably springing from the sacred spirit of the law interpreted in the strictest accordance with the time-honored principles of constitutional government, then, gentlemen, let us not have one artfully made by the lawyers' ingenuity of technical construction. What glory will it be to the American jurist to show the highest keenness of wit in defending such an act and in establishing it as a precedent which, through its disastrous consequences, may oblige the American people to shed as much blood and as many tears to restore their free institutions as it had cost to build them up.

I heard the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] exclaim the other day that he was glad not to find in the history of this country any such case as this, and he hoped to see none in the future. Truly, I felt with him; but he will see another one, and more than one, if as a lawyer he tries and succeeds in making this generation believe that this can be rightfully done under the Constitution and the laws of the Republic. Ah, gentlemen, the lawyer's technical ingenuity has not seldom done more harm to free government than even the arbitrary spirit of the soldier, for the latter would frequently have been impotent but for the aid of the former. It may be the lawyer's ambition successfully to defend even the most obvious guilt of his client, but it is the lawyer's highest glory to stand fearlessly before the frowns of power, defending the sanctity of the law and the rights and liberties of his countrymen; and of such are the names that are handed down with imperishable honor from generation to generation. I trust, therefore, we shall have in this debate only the purest and loftiest spirit of that jurisprudence which is nursed among a people proud of their liberties.

Let us above all things be spared such miserable subterfuges as these: That because the speaker of the Legislature invited an officer of the Army to persuade a disorderly crowd in the lobby to remain quiet, he had thereby given him the right or recognized his right to drag from their seats men seated as members in that Legislature; or that, as the insurgents of September had not surrendered all the guns belonging to the State, the insurrection continued, and with it the right of the Federal Army to organize the Legislature of Louisiana! Let not so pitiable a plea be heard when the fundamental principles of constitutional government are in jeopardy. If there be an argument in its defense, let it at least be one on a level with the dignity of the cause.

I have moved that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report a bill to secure to the people of Louisiana their right of self-government under the Constitution. I hope that motion will prevail. I hope also it will not result in the production of a bill providing for a new election there with General Sheridan, who, with all the brilliancy of his military valor, is so conspicuously unsuited for the delicate task of a conciliatory mission, as supreme ruler of that State; with a Packard as manager at the same time of the political campaign and of the United States dragoons to arrest opponents, and with that returning board to canvass the votes which has given already so much evidence of its unscrupulous skill. Let it not be another mockery to lead to another disgrace. I trust the committee will discover a method to undo the usurpations that have been perpetrated, in full, and to restore their rights and powers to those whom the people of Louisiana by their votes have lawfully designated to wield them. No measure will avail, either to the cause of peace and order or to the safety of our institutions or to the character of the Government, which does not boldly vindicate the constitutional principles of the land, the privileges of legislative bodies, and that self-government of the people without which our republican institutions cannot live.

I have spoken earnestly, sir, for my feelings and convictions on this great subject are strong and sincere. I cannot forget that this Republic, which it has cost so much strife and so much blood to establish and to preserve, stands in the world to prove to struggling mankind that the self-government of the people under wise laws is able to evolve all necessary remedies for existing evils without violating popular liberty or constitutional rights. I cannot forget that, if we fail in solving this vital problem, this Republic will become not a guiding star of liberty, but only another warning example. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the generation which has grown up to political activity during and since the war, a generation constituting more than one-third of the voting body in the land, soon to constitute the whole, has but too much been accustomed to witness the bold display of arbitrary assumptions of authority, and that habits have grown up threatening to become destructive to all that the patriot holds dear. Knowing this I have for years stood upon this floor raising my voice for the imperilled principles of constitutional government, and endeavoring to warn you and the country of the insidious advance of irresponsible power; and with all the anxiety of an honest heart—and it may be my last opportunity upon this great forum—I cry out to you once more: Turn back, turn back in your dangerous course while it is yet time. In the name of that inheritance of peace and freedom which you desire to leave to your children, in the name of the pride with which the American lifts up his head among the nations of the world, do not trifle with the Constitution of your country, do not put in jeopardy that which is the dearest glory of the American name. Let not the representatives of the people falter and fail in the supreme hour when the liberties of the people are at stake.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to attempt a general reply to the elaborate and carefully prepared speech to which we have just listened; but I shall content myself with submitting a few observations which I think may be justly offered in reply to that speeeh.

In the first place, I would say in reply to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] that I am as much in favor of local self-government as he is. I am in favor of "government for the people and by the people," and "by the people" I mean all the people. I believe in the right of the majority to govern and not in the right of the minority to govern; and one difficulty which we now labor under in this country is that in certain States of this Union the colored people are not recognized as being a part of the people. They are not recognized as having political and civil rights; and when certain men talk about local self-government by the people, they mean by the white people. I comprehend as a part of the people white and black—all American citizens; and until this claim is recognized, that the colored people of these States are a part of the people of the United States, entitled to take part in the government, I am sure there will be no peace.

Mr. President, we have heard the President of the United States to-day charged with having been guilty of a gross and manifest violation of the Constitution of the United States on last Monday in the State of Louisiana through the operation of the Army of the United States. That is a grave charge. It ought not to be made unless there is the most satisfactory evidence that it is true. On last Tuesday a resolution was offered in this body calling on the President for all the information, the facts, dispatches, and letters in connection with this affair in Louisiana. That resolution, after a long and somewhat excited debate, was passed on Friday evening. I am assured that the President will respond to that resolution to-morrow, and that he will lay before the Senate and the country all the dispatches and correspondence and the true condition of affairs in Louisiana upon which he and subordinate officers have acted. I regret that the Senator from Missouri could not wait until that information came in, for I apprehend that when it does come the Senator will find himself in the attitude of a juror who has delivered his verdict before he has heard the testimony.

The Senator from Missouri has given his version of the affair in the State-house in New Orleans on last Monday. If there was any observation made by him that indicated that the attempt on the part of Wiltz and others to organize the house was unlawful, was violent, I do not remember what it was. I think all who heard the Senator must have understood from him that the proceedings of Wiltz and the conservative members of that body, and those who came to be members of it, were regular; that they did nothing in violation of the law. The Senator has certainly made that impression upon the Senate and upon this audience, that what was done was lawful and in pursuance of law. Now, Mr. President, if it shall turn out that what was done was in gross violation of law, in violation of the law of the State; that it was an attempted usurpation; that it was mere violence and mob action—I say if that shall turn out to be the fact, then the principal foundation of the Senator's speech is gone. Now I will have read in the hearing of the Senate the dispatch from General Sheridan, sent on last Saturday, giving the history of that organization, and I call upon the Senate to take notice of the difference between that statement and the statement made by the Senator from Missouri, and to take notice of the omissions, the very important and material omissions, in the statement of the Senator from Missouri. I will further add that I am informed and believe that the statement of General Sheridan comes short of the whole truth, and that there will be evidence submitted by the President, perhaps on to-morrow, making the case still stronger, showing the outrage still more outrageous, the attempted usurpation still more monstrous, than that set forth by General Sheridan. Now I ask to have the statement of General Sheridan read, and I submit that his opportunities of knowing the truth, being upon the ground, are entirely superior to those of the Senator from Missouri.

The Chief Clerk read the dispatch of General Sheridan, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 8, (received 3 a. m.)

HON. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to submit the following brief report of affairs as they occurred here in the organization of the State Legislature on January 4, 1875. I was not in command of this military department until nine o'clock at night on the 4th instant, but I fully indorse and am willing to be held responsible for the acts of the military as conservators of the public peace upon that day.

During the few days I was in the city prior to the 4th of January the general topic of conversation was the scenes of bloodshed that were liable to occur on that day, and I repeatedly heard threats of assassinating the governor and regrets expressed that he was not killed on the 14th of September last; also threats of the assassination of republican members of the house, in order to secure the election of a democratic speaker. I also knew of the kidnaping by the banditti of Mr. Cousinier, one of the members-elect of the Legislature.

In order to preserve the peace and to make the State-house safe for the peaceable assembling of the Legislature, General Emory, upon the requisition of the governor, stationed troops in the vicinity of the building. Owing to these precautions the Legislature assembled in the State-house without any disturbance of the public peace. At twelve o'clock William Vigers, the clerk of the last house of representatives, proceeded to call the roll, as according to law he was empowered to do. One hundred and two legally-returned members answered to their names; of this number fifty-two were republicans, and fifty were democrats.

Before entering the house Mr. L. A. Wiltz had been selected in caucus as the democratic nominee for speaker and Mr. Michael Hahn as the republican nominee. Vigers had not yet finished announcing the result, when one of the members, Mr. Billican, of Lafourche, nominated Mr. L. Wiltz, as temporary speaker. Vigers promptly declared the motion out of order at that time, when some one put the question, and, amid the cheers of the democratic side of the house, Mr. Wiltz dashed on to the platform, pushed aside Mr. Vigers, seized the speaker's chair and gavel, and declared himself speaker.

A protest against this arbitrary and unlawful proceeding was promptly made by the members of the majority, but Wiltz paid no attention to those protests, and, upon a motion from some one on the democratic side of the house, declared one Trezevant nominated and elected clerk of the house. Mr. Trezevant at once sprang forward and occupied the clerk's chair, amid the wildest confusion over the whole house. Wiltz then again, on another nomination from the democratic side of the house, declared one Floord elected sergeant-at-arms, and ordered that a certain number of assistants be appointed. Instantly a large number of men throughout the hall, who had been admitted on various pretexts, such as reporters and members' friends and spectators, turned down the lapels of their coats, upon which were pinned blue-ribbon badges, on which were printed in gold letters the words, "assistant sergeant-at-arms," and the assembly was in the possession of the minority, and the White League of Louisiana had made good its threats of seizing the house, many of the assistant sergeants-at-arms being well known as captains of White-League companies in this city.

Notwithstanding the suddenness of this movement, the leading republican members had not failed to protest again and again against this revolutionary action of the minority, but all to no purpose; and many of the republicans rose and left the house in a body, together with the clerk, Mr. Vigers, who carried with him the original roll of the house as returned by the secretary of state.

The excitement was now very great. The acting speaker directed the sergeant-at-arms to prevent the egress or ingress of members or others, and several exciting scuffles, in which knives and pistols were drawn, took place, and for a few moments it seemed that bloodshed would ensue. At this juncture Mr. Dupre, a democratic member from the parish of Orleans, moved that the military power of the General Government be invoked to preserve the peace, and that a committee be appointed to wait upon General De Trobriand, the commanding officer of the United States troops stationed at the State-house, and request his assistance in clearing the lobby. The motion was adopted. A committee of five, of which Mr. Dupre was made chairman, was sent to wait upon General De Trobriand and soon returned with that officer, who was accompanied by two of his staff officers.

As General De Trobriand walked down to the speaker's desk loud applause burst from the democratic side of the house. General De Trobriand asked the acting speaker if it was not possible for him to preserve order without appealing to him as a United States Army officer. Mr. Wiltz said it was not, whereupon the general proceeded to the lobby, and addressing a few words to the crowd, peace was at once restored. On motion of Mr. Dupre, Mr. Wiltz then, in the name of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, thanked General De Trobriand for his interference in behalf of law and order, and the general withdrew.

The republicans had now generally withdrawn from the hall and united in signing a petition to the governor, stating their grievances, and asking his aid, which petition, signed by fifty-two legally-returned members of the house, is in my possession. Immediately, subsequent to the action of Mr. Wiltz in ejecting the clerk of the old house, Mr. Billien moved that two gentlemen from the parish of De Soto, one from Union, one from Bienville, and one from Iberia, who had not been returned by the returning board, be sworn in as members, and they were accordingly sworn in by Mr. Wiltz, and took seats upon the floor as members of the house. A motion was now made that the house proceed with its permanent organization, and accordingly the roll was called by Mr. Trezevant, the acting clerk, and Wiltz was declared elected speaker and Trezevant clerk of the house.

Acting on the protest made by the majority, the governor now requested the commanding general of the department to aid him in restoring order and enable the legally-returned members of the house to proceed with its organization according to law. This request was reasonable and in accordance with law. Remembering vividly the terrible massacres that took place in this city on the assembling of the constitutional convention in 1866 at the Mechanics' Institute, and believing that the lives of the members of the Legislature were or would be endangered in case an organization under the law was attempted, the posse was furnished with the request that care should be taken that no member of the Legislature returned by the returning board should be ejected from the floor.

This military posse performed its duty under directions from the governor of the State, and removed from the floor of the house those persons who had been illegally seated and who had no legal rights to be there, whereupon the democrats arose and left the house, and the remaining members proceeded to effect an organization under the State laws. In all this turmoil, in which bloodshed was imminent, the military posse behaved with great discretion. When Mr. Wiltz, the usurping speaker of the house, called for troops to prevent bloodshed, they were given him. When the governor of the State called for a posse for the same purpose and to enforce the law, it was furnished also. Had this not been done, it is my firm belief that scenes of bloodshed would have ensued.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, assuming that the statement made by General Sheridan is true, I call attention to the remarkable omissions in the statement of that transaction to which we have listened from the Senator from Missouri. His statement would leave the impression that it was regular and lawful. The statement of General Sheridan shows that it was unlawful, violent, and an attempted usurpation, and had it succeeded would have been an enormous fraud. Whoever undertakes to defend the action of Wiltz and his confederates on that occasion undertakes to defend the perpetration of a fraud the existence of which cannot be denied in the face of this official statement. And I am advised further, and I may say that it will so appear perhaps to-morrow, that while these transactions were going on a prominent member of the conservative party, a manager, a man well known, declared there upon the floor that as soon as the house was organized it was the intention to organize what was called the McEnery senate, and then to inaugurate McEnery as governor, and thus completely to overturn the existing State government of Louisiana. In other words, that this transaction was simply a part of a revolution deliberately planned to overturn on that day the State government of Louisiana. On the 14th of September the State government had been overturned by military power. Some seven or eight thousand men had made an assault upon the lawful police of the State and upon the State government in the streets of New Orleans, and some seventy-five men were murdered and perhaps a larger number were wounded, some of them fatally. The President was called upon by the governor of Louisiana to interfere for the protection of lawful authority. He responded, and I believe men of all parties conceded that he responded lawfully and was bound to respond, and that he properly reinstated the government of Kellogg. He issued his proclamation calling upon the insurgents to break up their organization and to surrender their arms. With this proclamation they had not complied. Their organizations were intact in the city of New Orleans and in the State of Louisiana. That was testified to only three or four days before before this investigating committee; General Ogden swearing before that committee that the White League in the city of New Orleans at that time comprehended some twenty-eight hundred men, to say nothing at all about the organization in the rest of the State. They never surrendered their arms. There they remained, and still remain in the city of New Orleans ready to spring to arms at any moment. They were to aid and to sustain this attempt on last Monday to seize the State government of Louisiana.

Now, I submit, if these things turn out to be so, that this attempt on last Monday was but a continuation of the insurrection of the 14th September; if the President had a right to put that down, he had a right to keep it down. If he had a right to prevent Penn from being inaugurated, then he had a right to prevent an insurrectionary legislature from being established on last Monday. This attempt on the part of the Senator from Missouri to ignore the leading facts must not, it cannot, succeed before the people of this country. When he charges the President with having violated the Constitution, with having committed an impeachable offense, let it be borne in mind that the facts show or will show, as I apprehend, that the President was simply preventing a second overturning of the Kellogg government by force and violence.

Now, a few words in regard to the general condition of the State of Louisiana. The Senator says that we cannot conceal these usurpations by talking about murder and by talking about violence. I tell him in reply that he cannot cover up this murder, this organized conspiracy, by this talk about usurpation on the part of the President of the United States. They may assail General Sheridan. He said in his first dispatch, "there is no security for life in Louisiana." Was that statement true? I believe it was true in letter and in spirit; and that there are armed organizations to-day in the State of Louisiana that make insecure the life of republicans, both white and black.

Let me review, for a very little while, what has been the bloody history of Louisiana. I will go back to 1866. In 1866 a convention attempted to assemble in the Mechanics' Institute in the city of New Orleans simply for the purpose of proposing amendments to the constitution of the State of Louisiana. They were prevented from assembling by force. Some two hundred men were killed and wounded in less than one hour, chiefly by the police of New Orleans, for this offense. Then in 1868 we reconstructed Louisiana; and what are the facts? The first election was held in May, under the authority of the General Government. It was peaceable; there was no pretense of disorder; all people were protected in the exercise of the right to vote, and the republicans carried that State by about 27,000 majority. I speak now only from general recollection. This was in May. Afterward, in November, a Presidential election was held when the protection was withdrawn; but some two months before that election was held the Ku-Klux commenced their operations in the State of Louisiana. A committee was sent down there the next winter to investigate, and they made their report, and that report shows that within sixty days before the Presidential election in 1868 some two thousand men were killed and wounded in Louisiana for their political opinions. It created a reign of terror, just what they are trying to establish now. The election came on, and at the Presidential election the democratic candidate carried the State by 42,000 majority, making a change of 73,000 votes from May until November. In many parishes General Grant did not even get one vote; in other parishes he got two; in other parishes five; in other parishes ten; but the important fact is that these numerous murders, numbering as reported by the committee something over two thousand killed and wounded, (and they did not get all over the State,) had produced a terror which between May and November made a change of 73,000 votes.

How was it in Georgia in the same time? The Senator from Missouri talked about Georgia. In the month of May or June when the State election was held in Georgia in 1868 under the protection of General Meade the republican party carried the State of Georgia by some ten thousand majority. In November, when that protection was withdrawn and the enemies of the Government had organized, Seymour carried the State over Grant by some thirty-five thousand majority, making the difference of some forty-five thousand votes in Georgia between the month of May or June and November. This was the result of intimidation; the result of violence.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just to ask him one question? I would like him to state what the majority in New York was at the election preceding the late November election, and what the majority of the democrats was at the last election, and then let me know if that was caused by intimidation.

Mr. MORTON. I do not propose now to be diverted from the main course of my remarks. The Senator will have ample opportunity to tell of these things. I am speaking about these enormous changes. It is enough simply to state them to understand that they were in great part the result of violence.

I now come down to 1872, when the election was held for governor in the State of Louisiana. The republican party were notoriously in the majority in the State of Louisiana. They had a majority of some twenty thousand. I believe it cannot be successfully disputed that Louisiana was overwhelmingly republican; and Louisiana would have elected the republican ticket if the most monstrous frauds and intimidation had not been practiced. We know what the machinery was. We know what the bargain was. We know that the attempt was made to carry Louisiana for the democratic ticket by a monstrous and elaborate fraud. Those who insist that McEnery was elected insist upon a fraud that overcame twenty thousand majority. Those who clamor that Kellogg does not represent the majority of the people of Louisiana must do it in the face of the most notorious fact that Louisiana was overwhelmingly republican. Without going into the particulars of that election it is enough to say that the day Kellogg was inaugurated he represented a majority of not less than twenty thousand voters of the State of Louisiana; and if McEnery had been forced as governor upon the people of Louisiana he would have represented a minority certainly of twenty thousand voters, and he would have been governor by the operation of the most notorious and the most shameless frauds. Therefore, those who insist on McEnery insist upon the most monstrous election fraud that has been attempted in modern times.

Now, Mr. President, to come on down a little further, the reign of violence did not terminate; it still went on. What took place at Colfax, in Grant Parish, in 1873, now a little over a year ago? A massacre of negroes took place, unprovoked, not justified by a single circumstance, in which there were from eighty to one hundred colored men murdered in cold blood. The man that commanded and that led that massacre had McEnery's commission in his pocket. The White League existed in substance, though it may not have been called the White League at that time. Take those murders that shocked the civilized world and made the cheek of mankind turn pale; no man has been punished; and there have been continued murders. In the murder at Coushatta last summer a more cold-blooded and atrocious slaughter never took place, where republican officers were compelled to resign their offices, who had been elected in a parish overwhelmingly republican. White men, men of property and substance, who had gone there to live, who were improving the country, were called upon to resign to save their lives, and they did so. Then they were promised safe conduct out of the country. They were compelled to go into exile, but they were ruthlessly butchered after they had left the little town only a few miles. This was defended and justified by many of the newspapers of that State, and no man has been punished, and no man can be punished.

And now to come down to the 14th of September. That same military organization existing there that exists now, prepared to do the same deeds, having the same purpose in view, organized and appeared in force upon the streets of New Orleans, committed nearly one hundred murders, attempted many more, and actually overthrew the State government of Louisiana. There the murderers are to-day. There they were on last Monday surrounding that State-house, prepared to renew those deeds of violence and to carry out that carefully-concocted scheme of overturning the State government of Louisiana that was so ingeniously commenced in the State-house, of which General Sheridan has given a description.

And shall all these things be ignored? Shall we be told that we are talking about the "outrage business" when we mention these things? Here was a system to carry an election by fraud and by blood, to seize the State of Louisiana from the republican party not by legitimate methods of electioneering but by murder, by the instrumentality of man-killing; not by publishing documents, by making speeches, and seeking to convert men, but by the argument of the shot-gun, the revolver, and the bowie-knife. Sir, that system of electioneering is much cheaper than the other one. It does not cost as much as mass-meetings. It does not cost $200 a speech; it does not cost for printing public documents and for those expenses that are common to parties. No, sir, it is cheaper; and when a man is taken from the republican party by the shot-gun, he never returns to it; when he is once converted by the pistol and the bowie-knife, he never comes back to the party again. It is a most cheap and effective method of changing the politics of a State.

And the same thing exists in other States. Only a few weeks ago a terrible massacre took place at Vicksburgh. I know a hundred lies have been published to excuse that slaughter, but they are all contemptible in their character. I put them aside with abhorrence and contempt. It was a cold-blooded, deliberate slaughter of nearly one hundred men who had committed no offense and were proposing to commit no offense; and when the word was given by the telegraph in Louisiana that the slaughter was going on in Vicksburgh some five hundred of the white-leaguers got on a steamboat and went up to Vicksburgh and offered their service. They wanted to take part in the sport of killing these negroes. Unfortunately the fun was over when they got there, but they avowed their readiness to respond upon any future occasion, and they were thanked by the white-leaguers of Vicksburgh for their presence and for their good intentions. Yet the Senator did not mention that. He spoke about murder and violence with a few glittering generalities, and all those things were passed by. Has it come to this, fellow-citizens, that a party is to be exterminated in a number of States of this Union by bloodshed and by murder? That is the policy, disguise it as you will. Talk about General Grant, and talk about the republican party, and talk about carpet-baggers, and sneer at them as adventurers, the plain and sober truth is, and it cannot be disguised, that there is a policy existing in a number of States to destroy the power of the republican party by means of terror, that terror to be created by murder. Justify it who can. I do not envy the head or the heart that can laugh and can jeer over these things. I think the crime of murder the highest of all crimes, comprehending all crimes; that the man who will commit murder will for his protection or justification commit perjury, forgery, arson, or any other subordinate crime.

The republican party is solemnly warned that they must not go on in this way. I shall not defend the conduct of all men in the Southern States. There may have been wrongs committed; I doubt not that there were. They are not all on one side. Where you find a fraud committed you will find men on all sides in politics participating in it; and this talk about carpet-baggers, how shameful and how cruel that has been! How brutal that talk has been! Who are these carpet-baggers, the most of them? The most of them are soldiers who bore the flag of their country in triumph during the late rebellion; and after the war was over, pleased with the South and believing there were openings there for them and fine prospects for wealth, remained there or went back there to live. They have been received as enemies. The attempt is made to destroy the character of every one of them. You cannot point to a northern man who has gone down there who has gone into politics who has not been assailed. Every attempt has been made to assail his character and to destroy his reputation. Sometimes these charges are true; but they are not often true. They are much oftener false than they are true, and yet we listen to them, we give credence to them oftentimes ourselves. And then what principle is involved?

Why, Mr. President, has not a northern man the right to go to Louisiana and hold office if the people choose to elect him? Is that a crime? Do they not go from the East to the Western States and become candidates for office, and become governors and members of Congress? Any man can go to the State of Indiana, and if his talents and his character will induce the people of that State to elect him to office, there is no political enemy to stand up there and talk about his being a carpet-bagger. There is no man who denies his right, because he was born in Massachusetts or in South Carolina, to go to Indiana or any Northern State and hold office; and yet the fact that northern men hold office in the South is put forward as a crime; they are denounced as adventurers and carpet-baggers. Many of these men have remained there with their lives in their hands, submitted to every species of contumely and disgrace, driven from society, driven from business, open compacts and leagues made not to trade with them, not to do business with them, and resort to all the machinery of business and society to drive them out. A man is talked about as an intruder because he went there from Indiana or from some other Northern State. Thank God, Louisiana is a part of my country, and the people from Indiana have as much right to go there as to any Northern State, and if they can obtain the confidence of the negroes or of the white men, or of a majority of the voters in any county or counties, to be elected to office, it is their right. Men come from abroad, from Germany; they locate in the different States; we acknowledge there right to hold office where they have the ability and where they can acquire the confidence of the people. How then shall it be said that those who go from the North to the South, and whom the people of those States choose to put into office, are carpet-baggers, adventurers, and public enemies?

Sir, we owe to these carpet-baggers the reconstruction of the South. When reconstruction was proposed, every attempt was made to prevent white men in the South from taking a part in it. They were denounced as scalawags. The most eminent southern man who would take a part in the reconstruction of the Southern States was at once driven from society, treated as a public enemy, everything done to destroy his character and to destroy his influence; and when northern men who went there to live, soldiers who had remained there after many hard-fought fields, the colored men being unacquainted with politics, and the southern white republicans many of them poor and heretofore not engaged in politics, naturally put those men forward. It was a sort of political necessity, and instead of being condemned, they should be protected and defended. Shall I be told that every man who holds an office in the South, having gone there from the North, is to be regarded simply as an office-seeker? Why not make that charge against the men who carpet-bag from the East to the West, from the North to the South, from the old countries to the New World? Why not make the charge against them that they have gone simply for office. I make no such charge. I recognize the rights of all men, but I take this occasion to denounce that gross, that inhuman, and that brutal cry that has been raised against the so-called carpet-baggers of the South.

We have been told that it is important to the colored vote to divide. I have no objection to that. Let the colored men divide their votes; it is their right to do it; and they will divide their votes when the time comes, if the democratic party can satisfy them that they are their friends. But it is most unnatural now that they should vote the democratic ticket. They remember that these democrats formerly owned them as slaves. They remember that the war was made to perpetuate slavery. They remember that these same men resisted their enfranchisement, resisted clothing them with civil and political rights; and they know full well, or they think they know it, and I think they do know it, that if these very men had the power they would to-morrow put them back, if not into a condition of slavery, into a condition of vassalage that is the very next door to slavery and perhaps quite as bad. Are we, therefore, to blame that the colored men do not vote the democratic ticket? When they become satisfied that the democratic party are their friends many of them will vote the democratic ticket, and rightfully; but now the attempt is made to compel them to vote that ticket by violence, and to murder them because they do not vote that ticket. Because they will not put aside the men who made them free, who have given them protection at every step since 1861, and take to their political embraces the men who have constantly been their enemies and who would enslave them to-morrow if they had the power, they are considered worthy of death!

Now, Mr. President, I am glad the issue has come. There is no blinking it. On this floor we hear scarce any condemnation on the part of one side of the Chamber of these slaughters and of these murders. On the contrary, they are rather excused by saying that the southern people have had great provocation, they have been robbed, and they have been plundered! Let the issue come. It is right here. I say there will be no peace until there is security for life and property. As long as it is considered proper, and genteel, and the thing to murder men in the South because they are black and white republicans, so long, so far as I am concerned, I have no compromise to make with those men. Whenever they lay down their arms, whenever it shall become safe, and honorable, and comfortable for men to go from the North to the Southern States and there profess to be republicans, proclaim their faith upon the house-tops, and hold public meetings, then there will be peace and there will be harmony; but until that time comes there can be no peace. We, as republicans of the North, cannot tamely submit to that state of things at the South. We would be wanting in self-respect if we did that. We must, therefore, to assert our own rights, continue to vindicate the rights of republicans in the Southern States to the enjoyment of all privileges, civil and political, that belong to other men.

The Senator from Missouri said that a certain committee that had been in the South was about to make a report. I do not know anything about that. He went on to foreshadow the character of that report. I do not know whether he is well-informed or not, and I do not care. There is a vast body of information coming from the South, for months and for years past, upon which we can form and make up our opinions in regard to a great many things; and one thing I want to say is that no charges of fraud in election, no charges against the carpet-baggers, no charges against adventurers, will enable them to cover up the bloody tracks of the white-leaguers of Louisiana and of other States. The President of the United States was called upon on the 14th of September to reinstate a Government overturned by murder and violence. That purpose was continued; it was in full force on last Monday. All the machinery was in operation to again overturn that State government. The President has never withdrawn his protection from Louisiana. There has been no time when he could do it. Those men have never dissolved their organizations, they have never surrendered their arms, but they have been there in force and armed, and they are there to-day. What they want is to be "let alone," and then they will take possession of Louisiana, and they will take possession of Mississippi in the same way, and they will take possession of Florida in the same way, and they will take possession of South Carolina in the same way; and thus they intend to secure a solid democratic South, where it can only be done by the instrumentality employed in Louisiana; and it is to be accomplished in the same way. I do not charge all the people of Louisiana, or the white people of the South, or all the democrats, with being a party to these things. I am glad to believe there is a vast body of democrats who do not approve of them; but what I mourn over is their silence. They dare not assert themselves. The white-leaguers are in the ascendency, and they control all things, and those in the democratic party who disapprove these things are compelled to be as silent as the republicans themselves. O, if the democrats North and South would rise up and condemn these things they could shame these white-leaguers into silence, perhaps into dissolution; but as long as they control the politics of the South, as long as they are the controlling power down there, so long must we treat them as the controlling element, and so long must we deal with them.

Mr. President, all that we ask on behalf of the South and of every other State is fair play, security for life, security for liberty, the enjoyment of equal rights. We ask that, and we will be content with nothing less. We shall not be put off by these general assaults upon the Administration. We shall not be put off by these howlings against carpet-baggers. "Blood is thicker than water," and protection to the lives of men is the highest political consideration for government. The highest duty of any government, in this or any other country, is to protect the lives of the people; and wherever government fails to do that, it comes short of discharging its highest functions. Shall it be said that an American citizen is safe on the coast of Africa, in Asia, or all over Europe; that the wanton murder of half a dozen Americans in the city of London, when the murderers go unpunished, would be cause of war with the empire of England; and yet, at the same time, that the only place where American citizens are not safe is upon American soil; that the only place where they can be murdered with impunity, by the score and by the hundred, is at home; that the American flag is protection to American citizens all the world over except in the United States of America? That is the condition of things now. I would have it changed, and I would have the Government of the United States protect the lives and the liberties of the people in every State in this Union where the State government is unable to do it or fails to do it. That is the highest function of the Government of the United States. I believe we are a nation divided into States for local and domestic purposes; that the States have their rights, sacred and unapproachable. I will guard the States as vigilantly as any man in the enjoyment of all their rights; but it is the supreme function of the Government of the United States to protect the people in the equal enjoyment of the law, to protect them in their rights and in their liberties where the governments of the States are unable or unwilling to do so.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I am sure that if the Senator from Wisconsin intends to discuss this question with any elaboration whatever, there is no time for it this evening at this late hour; and therefore with his permission so as to give him the floor after the morning hour to-morrow, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GORDON. Before that motion is put, if the Senator will allow me a word, I will not occupy by the clock more than ten minutes, and if the Senate will indulge me that far, unless the Senator from Wisconsin prefers to go on this afternoon, I want to make a very few remarks in reply to some things that have been said by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOWE. I am asked to yield to the Senator from Illinois to move an executive session. My purpose was to address the Senate in the course of this debate, and to follow the Senator from Missouri; but it suited the Senator from Indiana to speak this afternoon, and of course I gave way to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that before we adjourn, at whatever hour, we shall have an executive session to-day.

Mr. HOWE. I shall yield of course to the Senator from Illinois to move an executive session.

Mr. LOGAN. There are many Senators around me who desire an executive session for the purpose of facilitating business, and I hope we shall have it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at four o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 11, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing. The morning hour begins at seventeen minutes after twelve o'clock.

The Cleak read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the subject-matter of the employment of money to procure legislation by Congress in aid of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, submit, in part, the following report:

That, in pursuance of the power conferred upon them by the House "to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths in any matter from time to time pending and under examination before said committee," they caused one Charles Abert, of Montgomery County, Maryland, to be summoned before them for the purpose of giving testimony, and the said Abert, after having been duly sworn, did, on the 6th, 7th, and 9th days of January, 1875, testify, among other things, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 9, 1875.

By the Chairman:

Question. You have testified that you received from the Pacific Mail Steamship Company $125,000?

Answer. Yes, sir; received from Mr. Irwin.

Q. Of that sum you deposited to his credit?

A. Eighteen thousand five hundred dollars.

Q. The balance of that $125,000 you have testified that you disbursed to his order?

A. Yes.

Q. That you received a list of persons to whom to pay it?

A. Yes.

Q. That you have paid according to his order to those persons that entire balance.

A. Yes, sir; $106,500.

Q. That you disbursed it, by his order, to different persons according to a list furnished you by him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that you accounted to him for those disbursements?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That you accounted to him at San Francisco after his return?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. About what time did he return to San Francisco?

A. He left New York for San Francisco, as far as I know, on the 27th of May.

Q. Do you know of his stopping anywhere on the way?

A. I do not.

Q. Did you deposit any of that money to your own credit anywhere?

A. I deposited to my own credit $5,000.

Q. Had you previously to the disbursement deposited any of the money which you disbursed?

A. To the best of my recollection I had not.

Q. You had held it in your hands in the form of money?

A. Yes, sir; the payments were promptly made.

Q. In the form of money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you give us the names of the persons to whom you distributed that $106,500 according to the directions of Mr. Irwin?

A. That question I decline to answer.

Q. Do you desire to give here any reason why you decline to answer it?

A. In order that I may consult counsel and also that I may obtain an order of the House.

Q. You decline to answer at this time?

A. As at present advised, I do.

Q. You have testified that many of the persons to whom you disbursed this money were strangers to you?

A. I do not know whether I said "many." I said that some of them.

Q. Some of those persons you had never seen before, and have never seen since?

A. No, sir.

Q. You distributed this money to them in Mr. Irwin's rooms?

A. I do not recollect that I distributed all of it in Mr. Irwin's rooms.

Q. Did you distribute any portion of it in Mr. Irwin's rooms?

A. I distributed the greater part of it in Mr. Irwin's rooms.

Q. After Mr. Irwin had left for California?

A. Unquestionably.

Q. Were you introduced to those persons whom you had never seen before and have never seen since by any person?

A. Unquestionably I was.

Q. Will you give us the name of the person who introduced those gentlemen to you?

A. As at present advised, I must decline to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. If you change your mind before twelve o'clock on Monday next, please to notify the committee.

The WITNESS. I will do so.

The committee are of opinion and report that it is necessary for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House that said questions should be answered, and that there is no sufficient reason why the witness should not answer the same, and that his refusal is in contempt of this House.

The committee recommend the adoption of the accompanying order:

Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Charles Abert, and him to bring to the bar of the House, to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the mean time keep the said Abert in custody to await the further order of the House.

Mr. DAWES. On that resolution I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I may state to the House that I expect that in a few moments this witness will be before the bar of the House—so soon as the Speaker shall have signed the warrant.

LEVI W. POND.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1390) to amend the act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent-right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872, was ordered to be reprinted.

W. MAXWELL WOOD, JR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of William Maxwell Wood, jr., for compensation for the use in the Navy of his boat detaching and attaching apparatus; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HIRAM W. LOVE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 4110) was laid on the table last Friday.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the title of that bill?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A bill for the relief of Hiram W. Love.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas on the 4th of January instant officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States have interfered with and controlled the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, and certain persons claiming seats in one branch thereof have been prevented from holding the same by said military force, which acts of military intervention and control resulted in dispersing the State Legislature and have received the sanction of the Chief Executive of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the deliberate judgment of this House such intervention and control were in violation of the Federal Constitution, inasmuch as said force was not used for the purposes defined by law, and could not be legally used except for purposes thus specifically defined; that such intervention and control were subversive of the principles upon which our system of government is founded, and have no precedent in our own history or the history of free government; that said intervention and control are defiant breaches of parliamentary privileges, and illegal and revolutionary infractions of legal government, chartered liberty, and solemn treaty obligations, and therefore are not only unjustifiable outrages upon the State of Louisiana and a menace to the liberties, rights, and dignity of every other State, tending to general demoralization and disorder by the overthrow of civil liberty by arbitrary power: We, therefore, in the name of the people of the United States, whose representatives we are, demand the restoration of tranquillity, order, and civil discipline in said State by the immediate withdrawal of the military force of the United States from said State and the condign punishment of those guilty of this reckless usurpation.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS—CHARLES ABERT.

Mr. DAWES. The Sergeant-at-Arms is at the bar of the House with Charles Abert, brought before the House by its own order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Charles Abert, alleged to be in contempt of the privileges of the House.

The SPEAKER. Charles Abert, you are at the bar of the House by its own order for an alleged contempt, in that you have declined to answer certain interrogatories propounded to you by the Committee on Ways and Means in the process of the investigation in regard to the subsidy of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Are you ready to answer the questions of the committee?

CHARLES ABERT. Mr. Speaker, I will state that in the course I have pursued I did not intend or desire to place myself in contempt.

I simply desired that the questions which I have hesitated to answer, and hesitated solely in consequence of the position in which my client has placed me, might have an order of the House upon them, and upon receiving an order of the House as to whether I shall answer those questions, that order being in the affirmative, I was ready to answer.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker of the House be directed to propound to the witness the following questions:

First. Will you state to the House the names of the persons to whom you distributed $106,500 of money belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, according to the directions of Mr. Irwin?

Second. Will you state to the House the names of the person or persons who introduced to you those individuals to whom you distributed any portion of said money?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a resolution that it be the duty of the Speaker to propound to the witness now at the bar in alleged contempt the questions which have been read in the hearing of the House.

Mr. DAWES. At the suggestion of a colleague on the committee, I will modify it so as to read "House or committee."

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to suggest that the usual mode when a witness gives assent is to have the examination in detail conducted before the committee.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; then I will strike out the word "House" and say "committee." The resolution adopted the other day in the Irwin case provided that the questions should be answered to the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be modified so as to read, "Will you state to the Committee on Ways and Means," &c.

There was no objection; and the modification was made.

Mr. DAWES. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Charles Abert, will you state to the Committee on Ways and Means the names of the persons to whom you distributed $106,500 of money belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, according to the directions of Mr. Irwin?

CHARLES ABERT. I will, upon being so ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER. Will you state to the Committee on Ways and Means the names of the person or persons who introduced to you those individuals to whom you distributed any portion of said money?

CHARLES ABERT. As far as I can upon being ordered by the House.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the witness be directed by the House to answer the questions propounded, and upon that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I now move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take the witness forthwith before the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the witness is in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that that order is not needed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. As this is rather an unusual motion on Monday, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, who makes the motion, whether his purpose is to cut off the opportunity from members of moving suspensions of the rules, which would be in order on Monday?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is my purpose simply to go on with the public business, which has been postponed for some time. Of course it will have the effect indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know whether any suspension of the rules will be allowed in the House this morning?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no control over that question. The only test of that is whether the House will now go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit general debate to thirty minutes; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider and table that vote.

The SPEAKER. There is no need of that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have once seen the order of the House limiting debate reconsidered, and the debate extended for three hours.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee of the Whole, while in session, should exhaust the time allowed for general debate, there is nothing in the way of the committee rising and obtaining an order from the House giving additional time for general debate, although it may have been reconsidered and tabled half a dozen times.

Mr. RANDALL. Does it not take a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole to-day?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not necessarily.

Mr. RANDALL. It being a question of higher privilege to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote than to suspend the rules by a majority vote, I think a motion to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote would take precedence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled in regard to suspensions of the rules on Monday, but not in the last ten days of the session.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to make that point for the future.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made that ruling, and desires to have it distinctly in the minds of gentlemen here. He has made the ruling that on Mondays, not during the last ten days of the session, the motion to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote takes precedence of a motion to suspend the rules by a majority vote. And on this ground that the Committee on Ways and Means or Appropriations have the right on every day of the week to move to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole. The right to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote on miscellaneous business is confined to Mondays, and is of higher privilege on that day. Therefore, if the point is made, it will require a two-thirds vote to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make the point for the future; I will not insist upon it to-day.

The motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

HOSPITAL AT HYANNIS, MASSACHUSETTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 14, 1874, in relation to the expense of erecting a pavilion hospital at Hyannis, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SUGG FORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1874, in relation to the claim of Sugg Fort, of Robinson County, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a list of claims for Indian depredations committed by the Indians, called for by the resolution of the House of April 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the draught of a bill to amend section 2997 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CORWIN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 3911 making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all general debate upon this bill will be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

Mr. SWANN. Before the reading of the bill for amendment is proceeded with, I desire to say one or two words upon it. I am happy to inform the committee that the amount appropriated by this bill is greatly in reduction of the amount appropriated for a similar purpose last year. I hold in my hand a list of items which are not called for by this bill, but were called for last year; that much less appropriations will be required of Congress at this session. The items are as follows, namely: For repaying the amount erroneously claimed by and paid to the United States by the government of Brazil, $57,500. This was the Webb case, well known to this House. For United States and Mexican claims commission, $28,700. For the surveys of northern boundary, $150,000. To pay the sums awarded to British subjects, under the treaty of May 8, 1871, $1,921,801. The total amount appropriated by the bill of last year was $3,347,304. The bill under consideration calls for $1,344,785, showing a reduction of $2,002,519.

There are one or two items in this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the committee for a moment. The bill of last year appropriated $150,000 for the survey of the northern boundary. It was a subject of some speculation here whether or not that sum would be sufficient. My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] seemed to be doubtful whether the work would be done for that amount. I am happy to inform this committee that the survey has been fully completed, and to the satisfaction of the Government and all concerned. The engineers who were engaged in that important work have gone into winter quarters, and are now engaged in making up the report of their labors. They have not only completed the work within the limit required by the Department of State, but they have brought back a small surplus, which will enable them to pay office rent and whatever may be necessary to complete and put in permanent shape the survey of that important boundary.

Mr. Chairman, I have reason to believe that the work has been fairly and satisfactorily accomplished. This great line has been completed after years of labor under circumstances not only satisfactory to this Government, but to the joint commissioners of Great Britain, who were employed to run that line in connection with our Government. The advantage to this country will be all that I represented it when I had the honor to present the diplomatic and consular bill on a former occasion. The accomplishment of this work is of great national importance, having fixed upon a line which, if it had not been promptly settled, might have given rise to a great deal of confusion in the existing relations of the two countries.

There was great apprehension that there would be, in the course of time, in case this question had not been settled, collisions arising on this subject between Great Britain and this country. And there was an apprehension also that parties not within our jurisdiction or the jurisdiction of Great Britain might desire to establish railways and to occupy this territory with a view to strategic movements upon the sovereignty of this country and the control which we claim to have over that line. In case this had occurred, it might have given rise to much of trouble and uneasiness and might perhaps have precipitated a misunderstanding between Great Britain and the United States.

As it turns out, however, it has been satisfactorily adjusted. The joint commissioners met upon the ground. All that has been done has been satisfactorily done on both sides; and the engineers come to us now, presenting the final result of this survey with the entire acquiescence of those who will be so seriously affected by it.

I will reiterate what I stated on a former occasion as to the prosecution of this survey and the acquisition of the territory which falls within the limits of the United States, comprising in value what will be a most important consideration to the Government of this country. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, we acquire territory amounting to more than seven or eight hundred acres of land, distant one mile from the post at Pembina, to where this boundary line terminates upon the Rocky Mountains. We have acquired that amount of territory; and no foreign power, no power claiming jurisdiction on the other side can come within such a distance that they can interfere with the jurisdiction of the United States. In that view this country by the survey will save, as I calculate, upward of a million dollars, besides protecting us against those casual misunderstandings which have sprung up heretofore and which might have given rise to a serious disagreement between the two nations.

While upon this particular point, I will make the statement, which I am sure will be very gratifying to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that this whole survey has, as to expense, been made within the limits we anticipated. I had very great confidence in the estimates which came to us from the State Department, made up as they were. I thought that the survey could be carried out upon the terms stated in the reports of the Secretary to this House; and the result shows that I have not miscalculated the accuracy with which these estimates were made, and the economy with which this great boundary line was prosecuted.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] will bear in mind, however, that although this survey may have been completed within the limits of the appropriation, $375,000, those limits were quite large.

Mr. SWANN. Does not my friend overstate the amount?

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the entire amount appropriated for this purpose. Does my friend say it was less than that? The original estimate was $325,000; but the appropriation made during the last three years actually reached $375,000—an amount, in my judgment, far beyond what the cost of the survey should have been. I wish to ask my friend a question in this connection. Here was a joint commission, charged with the duty of running this line from the Red River of the North to a point on the line of the Rocky Mountains. As a matter of fact, comparing our expenditures on this little item with those of the government with whom we were co-operating, does my friend know what was the cost to that government of executing their part of the commission?

Mr. SWANN. I will answer my friend by stating that, taking the salaries and other expenses incurred by the government of Great Britain, I suppose that twice the amount of our appropriation would not have covered the expense imposed upon the British government. I think the gentleman will find this to have been the fact, if he makes the proper inquiries at the State Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not able to state upon definite information the cost on the part of the British government, which co-operated with us in making the survey; but if the statement I have received is correct, that government was much more economical in the execution of this duty than we have been.

Mr. SWANN. My friend will find, I think, that it cost the British government three times as much as we allowed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have heard it stated that £10,000 covered the whole expense to that government.

Mr. ORTH. That is merely the amount of the contingent expenses.

Mr. SWANN. Taking in view the salaries and other expenses, and the scale on which those expenditures were graduated, I am satisfied that I shall be borne out in the statement I have just made, that the cost of this survey to the British government has been three times as much as the cost to the people of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. The first item of expenditure indicates the difference between the two methods of performing a public duty. Our bill really did not contemplate, or rather the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland three years ago did not contemplate, the appointment of a commissioner, but merely that some one employed in the survey should be commissioner, whose duty it would be simply to perform this very plain service. A commissioner, however, was in fact appointed, and he received a salary of $5,000 a year during this whole period; whereas the British government, as I understand, simply devolved the powers of a commissioner upon one of the scientific party engaged in making the survey. They avoided at once, as would naturally occur to any government desiring to proceed with reasonable economy, the employment of unnecessary officers, and devolved the duty, as I have said, on one of the astronomers or other scientific men connected with the survey. Our Government appointed a gentleman as commissioner with $5,000 a year for the whole period, while he had nothing but the nominal duties of a commissioner to discharge.

Mr. SWANN. Yes; and we saved money by it.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I think not; but I congratulate my friend from Maryland that this work at last has been done. I congratulate him especially in reference to one point, and that is for the pertinacious manner in which he has pressed the urgency of this whole subject upon the attention of the House so as to facilitate the final execution of the work. I am quite confident that in the absence of such diligence on his part this work would have remained on our hands for years to come.

Mr. SWANN. I differ from my friend, and I wish to correct him in this particular. He states that when these estimates came in originally, when the proposition first came before the House to prosecute this survey, we never contemplated such a survey as has since been made. I entirely differ from my friend. I recollect there was a discussion on this subject at the time. The gentleman from Indiana was opposed to this large expenditure of money, and intimated the survey could be made by any county surveyor. A delicate survey of that sort, requiring skill and science of a high order and the employment of men who stood in high position in reference to the various duties they had to discharge, was an undertaking, in my judgment, which required the expenditure of money in the payment of reasonably high salaries. I know, sir, that the variation of a single inch in running those lines might have entailed upon this Government a tremendous expense, and perhaps might have deprived us of this one mile of territory which extends from Pembina to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. We have gained that by this skillful survey made by competent scientific men. It is a survey which has been acquiesced in by some of the most distinguished gentlemen connected with the Engineer Corps or with astronomical science in this or any other country.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend from Maryland know, in the absence of there being a national question to furnish a convenient excuse for spending money out of the Treasury, the running of this line——

Mr. SWANN. It was not as the gentleman intimates.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does he not know in the absence of that consideration this work might have been performed by any respectable land surveyor with the reasonable knowledge of astronomy required in any of our institutions of learning?

Mr. SWANN. Why, sir, he would have been swamped in half an hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would have been done as well, and at an expense trivial in comparison with what already has been the cost. But I congratulate my economical friend from Maryland that the work has been done.

Mr. SWANN. Mr. Chairman, I claim to be economical so far as the expenditures of this Government are concerned, but I am not as much so as my friend from Indiana. Indeed, I think him too economical occasionally. If he were a little more liberal and expansive in his allowances to these officers of the Government engaged in the performance of public and national duties, it would, in my judgment, inure more largely to the benefit of the country. At the same time I express the highest respect for the intentions of my honorable friend. I am always ready to follow his lead when I find I can do so without serious injury to the public service.

But, sir, this survey has been made and this Government has saved a large amount of money. I say in the item of land alone, which it has acquired by this survey, it has saved money. We have realized perhaps millions of dollars in that way, if the land there be estimated upon any scale commensurate with the price of land in the region of country from which my friend comes. We have saved a large amount of money in case we design, as we shall do, to appropriate this territory hereafter; and that, too, in addition to the advantage which will inure to the Government of the United States by keeping off from our frontier and our boundaries men who may be disposed to give trouble, and who attempted to give trouble when they interfered with the settlement of the British government at Pembina, or rather in reference to the custom-house which was maintained there by the British Government for a long time.

Now, sir, I say it is a source of congratulation that this Government has gone through with this survey so triumphantly and advantageously. It is here to-day with its engineers making up the details of this work, presenting not only the views of our own engineers, but those of the British commissioner who co-operated with them. They have settled the details of the work in such way as to remove all apprehension of trouble hereafter in our relation with that government. I think it is just cause of congratulation.

I have stated that the saving or rather the decrease in this bill, compared with that of last year, amounted to nearly two million dollars. That consists of the various items to which I have called the attention of the House. I will state further that in the estimates of the amount which would be required by this Government to conduct its diplomatic and consular system, so far as I have been enabled to examine into the papers, the State Department in every instance has kept itself within the limits established by this House.

In some instances those limits have been slightly decreased, but in all instances the State Department have kept within the limits which they have prescribed to themselves; and they do not ask as much as they asked last year when these grave matters were under discussion here. This is an improvement, and a large improvement, on the bill reported to this House which I had the honor to lay before them last year.

Connected with this bill was a reorganization of the whole consular department, which was reported by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and I am happy to inform this House that so far as regards that report, which was accepted by this House and which has gone into a law, it is not proposed to be disturbed by the present management. I may state that the reorganization has operated most successfully, and has been cordially indorsed by the State Department, and they are now operating under this reorganization as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Many of the salaries have been reduced, all have been equalized, and the whole system is working now in a way that gives cause for congratulation that a subject which was involved in so much trouble has been disposed of as it has been, for I will state to the committee that no subject has produced more confusion in the State Department than the regulation of this consular system. It has been so modified and so arranged that at this time it is a source of congratulation to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the result of their labors to the House, and that they were adopted, as they have been cordially, by the Secretary of State.

I desire to reiterate the fact, that in the bill which I have the honor to report there is entire accordance with the estimates of last year. There is no serious variation, and it was a source of gratification to me that I was enabled to come here and report this bill with no such additions as would make deficiencies necessary, or would make necessary additional appropriations for the purpose of conducting the affairs of the State Department.

I think it is necessary, sir, in this brief explanation to state to the committee that on the return of the expedition from the survey of which I have spoken, having been absent from the country for many months, the person who was in charge of the survey, the chief engineer, rented a small building at the rate of a thousand dollars per year. He expects to finish his work in a very short time. There was no authority for the renting of that house. There was a law expressly prohibiting any officer of the Government from renting any house for public purposes without an express law of Congress. He therefore did it, sir, without knowledge. He was ignorant of the legislation which had transpired since he left the country; and at the proper time we shall offer an amendment providing that he be exonerated from any claim that may be made upon him, because he is personally responsible. If he had been aware of the existence of the law which we had passed here he would not have committed this error; and I take it for granted that as regards this small sum of a thousand dollars there will be no occasion on the part of the House to object to what has been done and the direction in which it has been done for the purpose of completing this survey; especially as it is proposed to take the cost of renting said building out of the surplus in the hands of the engineer, which will appear after the whole expense of this expedition has been settled. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to one of the bills that will be presented here asking that this officer be exonerated from all responsibility in renting that office for the purpose of this expedition.

I will state also, for the information of the committee, that the State Department has not yet been able to remove to its new quarters. They are now in the building which they hold upon a lease. They were in hopes of having the control of the new State Department by the 1st of January. It may involve the expense of a few thousand dollars if they should not be able to make terms with the present owners of the property and should not be able to cancel the lease that now exists. That may have to be provided for hereafter. The amount will be small and the expense could not have been avoided by any course that might have been pursued by the State Department, but I have thought it proper to mention the circumstance now, in order that when the question of a small deficiency on that account for the rent of this building comes up the House may know the ground upon which it has been presented.

These are the only items, Mr. Chairman, to which I would desire particularly to call the attention of the committee. It is a satisfaction to me to have been the organ of the Committee on Appropriations in presenting such a bill as this, containing as it does such a satisfactory exhibit, and inuring so largely as this must do to the benefit of this Government.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, in a speech which I made on the civil and diplomatic bill last session I indulged in some playful remarks, drawn from the diplomatic correspondence, illustrative of the inability and absurdity of certain alleged services. In one instance I have a regret to express. I refer to the remarks with reference to the Hon. Rumsey Wing, then United States minister at Ecuador. Since then he has deceased, leaving the most poignant sympathy among his many friends in Kentucky and elsewhere, who honored his services and his gallantry, and who mourn his untimely decease.

So far as I can learn, he did the country as much honor as any of our representatives in South America. His services are by no means to be reckoned by the ordinary standard of such positions. Professionally, socially, and politically, inside and outside of his party, he was eminently respected. My remarks fail utterly to depict the usefulness of his career abroad.

Mr. Wing was named for this post when but twenty-four years of age. Since his arrival in Ecuador, in June, 1870, his action, as I am advised, has met with generous and general approval in the proper quarters. I am informed that three treaties have been negotiated in that time through his vigilance and sagacity. Over forty thousand dollars have been collected for American creditors. All duties were removed from American machinery, which can thus undersell European competition. American engineers, mechanics, &c., were employed by the Government to which he was accredited. American citizens were sedulously protected in their rights, and an exceptionally pleasant intercourse inaugurated both with the Ecuador government and the people. This is evidenced by the fact that the Ecuadorian congress was the first to respond to our "centennial" by an appropriation for the articles to be exhibited by that republic in Philadelphia.

Mr. Wing remained at his post for over four years, despite wretched health and natural inclination. He has been so fortunate as to settle all up-rising questions amicably and satisfactorily.

Mr. Wing was a lawyer by profession and predilection; a student, I believe, of the late eminent Chief-Justice Robertson, of Kentucky.

It may not be amiss to say that no American legation contains to-day as complete a collection of standard works on international admiralty, civil, and common law. These were borne over the Andes by Mr. Wing, invalid though he was. It gives me a sad pleasure to so modify my former remarks as to place on record this testimonial to his character and service, and to express my regret that any wound should have been inflicted upon him or his friends by my criticism in the last session. If such a service is worth keeping up, it is of the first importance that men of such ability and character should represent us abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The half hour allowed by the House for general debate having expired, the Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, and under the head of appropriations for consuls, &c., read as follows:

Barbary States: Tripoli, Tunis, Tangiers.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out "Tripoli," with a view to saying one word.

I believe that the pay of the consul at Tripoli is $3,000. What he is paid for, sir, I cannot understand. There is no commerce between this country and Tripoli. I have looked at the books. The commercial record shows no commerce. They do trade there in gold dust, gum, ivory, elephant tusks, and ostrich feathers, but they do not send them to this country. About the only interesting thing that the consul has ever done for us was to accept from the bashaw the anchor of the United States frigate Philadelphia, which Decatur burned in 1804, and which the bashaw gave to our Government through this consul at a cost of ten dollars to a lighter to bring it on board one of our vessels. But, sir, this consel is called in the letter of the bashaw "the very illustrious sir consul." His name is Vidal. I wonder that my friend from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. ORTH,] who reads all the diplomatic papers in all languages, has not taken notice of the matter to which I call attention. It was published on December 1, 1873. No. 485 is a letter from Mr. Vidal to Mr. Hunter, dated United States Consulate, at Tripoli of Barbary, February 14, 1873. It was received on March 17. I will ask the Clerk to read three paragraphs which I have marked. While it is going to the desk I will remark this letter illustrates exactly what some of our consuls are paid for doing; not to promote commerce, and not to keep the entente cordiale, but for a singular purpose which will be developed by the correspondence of this illustrious consul.

The Clerk read as follows:

In connection with the subject of my dispatches Nos. 27 and 32, I have now the honor to transmit, herewith inclosed, (inclosure No. 1,) the translation of the extract of an article published seventeen months ago in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in regard to the work and regeneration undertaken in Bulgaria by agents of the New York Bible Society. While the energy, tact, and devotion displayed by those agents cannot fail to elicit praise from all who have seen them at work, it is nevertheless to be regretted that so much sterling worth should be wasted, as it were, in the midst of a population which will never repay them for their many self-imposed sacrifices. I will not say that the Bulgarian heart could be properly compared to a wayside or a stony place, but it is at best a thorny field where the most sanguine husbandman cannot reasonably hope to see the good seed thrive in proportion to his care.

Either commercially or from a political or religious point of view, the United States can never expect to gather anything from what they may sow in Bulgaria, which is far inland, and may be considered as the core of the Turkish Empire in Europe.

It would not be so on the coast of Africa south of Tripoli. There is the large population of the nomadic Touaregs, who belong to the white race, but are not descendants of the Arabic invaders. They appear to be a fraction of the same Berber race which is supposed to be autochthonic on the northern coast of the continent, and which, retreating before the invading flood of the Saracens, took refuge partly in the fortress of the Algerian Atlas, and partly in the Saharic desert.

Mr. COX. The House will observe that we pay this consul $3,000 a year at Tripoli, where we have no commerce, for the purpose of intermeddling with the New York or American Bible Society, and directing in regard to its operations. The society must be much obliged to this Government and its consul. Our distinguished Secretary of State actually publishes that most ridiculous letter. O, let us by all means direct the society here by vote to order its missionary movements away from Bulgaria, in European Turkey, many hundred miles away from that consulate, and into the wayside and stony resorts of the autochthonic Touaregs! Let us not waste our seed on that thorny ground of Bulgaria, whose heart is petrified against "the sanguine husbandman," but sow our seed away from the "core of the Turkish Empire in Europe"—within the fortresses of the Algerian Atlas and the Saharic desert! We will never be repaid for our "many self-imposed sacrifices" until under consular dictation the Touaregs, Tripolites, and the miserable Mohammedans of interior Africa, and others which he describes who are utterly unregenerate, listen to the Gospel tidings. He makes this report as consul. This is seriously reported to us by the Government for our direction on appropriations.

When we review hereafter our consular system with a view to a new reform, we might provide a copy of the Constitution of the United States with the clause in relation to religious liberty, specially dog-eared, to go out with each of our "illustrious sir consuls." Then they may learn not to meddle with business that does not concern them. Now, if it be right for us to have information at $3,000 a year salary from our consuls as to the exact spots abroad where we should direct our missionary or Bible efforts, would it not be more useful to have some little paid efforts in that respect at home? Where would or should we go—West, East, North, or South? It may be that among the people in Northern Africa there would be great opportunities for colporteur and other such efforts. If the consul describes the character of that people to which he has been accredited aright, there is plenty of room for amendment; for he says that—

Either black or white, the Mohammedans of this country are generally ignorant, indolent, dirty, cowardly, stupid, of a thievish and lying disposition, cringing before their Turkish rulers, and, in presence of Frankish consuls, hiding under an apparent abjection the deep hatred and ferocious contempt which they nurse at the bottom of their hearts for all Nazarenes.

There are in Tripoli five Franciscan monks from Italy, and eight Sisters of Charity from France; the ones and the others under the protection of the French consul-general, and supported by contributions from the faithful in France, but I never heard that they succeeded in converting one single Jew or Moslem to the Christian faith. The ladies of charity take care of the sick of all creeds, all races; keep a free school, where they give a pretty good kind of intellectual food. As for the monks, save that they say mass to the faithful, they are of no use to the Christians.

Thus freely does the consul report upon the miserable populations of Northern Africa. If that be true there, what of the Zanzibar slave trade, what of Nyanza, or Congo, or Dahomey? What, especially, might not be reported of the cotton plantations in some of our coast-wise islands? Where can we stop in finding good ground for Bible harvests? Besides this, he goes on further in his correspondence to show how the slave-trade is carried on there, and all the peculiar abuses of that trade. That is all very well; but does he want the United States, by some process, to direct the New York Bible Society as a sort of Federal deputy to transfer its efforts from Bulgaria, away off in European Turkey, down to the coast of Africa, where he conceives their efforts would be productive of more fruit, in order to modify or mollify the slave-trade with Bibles?

Mr. SWANN. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. SWANN. I would ask him whether or not the Secretary of State is expected to correct all the correspondence that comes to that Department?

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the Secretary of State exercises his discretion as to what sort of correspondence to publish. He has already omitted dispatches from this gentleman, perhaps of more questionable import than these—Nos. 27 and 33. God only knows what this man has been writing, and yet you give him $3,000 a year for this ignorance of all constitutional law and all knowledge of what a consul should do abroad. Now, I think the Secretary of State might make his selection of elegant diplomatic literature a little more choice. Then we would not know how our money is fooled away on objects not within the purview of consular duty, and with which we as a government have nothing to do. Perhaps the Secretary has published this extract to notify us not to make the appropriation!

Mr. SWANN. If that be so, I ask the gentleman whether he would have excused the Secretary of State if he had withheld from us this most valuable dispatch, to which he seems to attach so much importance.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Chairman, I never knew a man who had such a grave and serious deportment as my distinguished friend from Maryland; but it seems to me that there is a little chuckle coming up from his very diaphragm as he asks that question. He puts it in such a playful mood. I cannot complain of the Department of State for publishing its own nonsense, if it means thereby to make us wise unto the salvation of salaries. The gentleman commends it, and it seems that we are on the same side of that question. Then strike out this $3,000 appropriation and I am done.

Mr. SWANN. The gentleman was one of the very persons, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who reorganized this service; it was from his committee and his work in part.

Mr. COX. It was the work of the majority of that committee, for which my most admirable friend from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] is responsible, and for which the Department of State is more responsible, for it was mostly arranged there.

Mr. ORTH. I do not expect to be in the next Congress, and hence I will be deprived of the opportunity which will be enjoyed by the members of that Congress of hearing the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] take back his speech on Christianity of to-day, as to-day he has taken back the speech he made last year on cundurango. The motion which he made here was for the purpose of making an attack, playfully I grant you, and not seriously, upon a very important officer of this Government. It is true, as the gentleman says, that we have no commerce at Tripoli. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed less than three dollars received there in the way of consular fees.

But the gentleman has served too long with me upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs not to know that the duties of that officer are far more important than those of any other counsular officer in our service. He exercises in the court to which he is accredited quasi diplomatic functions and also judicial functions. Suppose that an American citizen, it may be an ex-member of Congress or some other gentleman, should happen to go down in that sunny country to collect sunbeams in the winter, and he should get into trouble there among the aborigines—my democrat friends at home will call them ab-ro-gines—to whom would he look for protection but to the American representative there, charged not only with diplomatic but with judicial functions? It does so happen, I have read it in books, that sometimes American citizens do get into trouble down there. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. COX] had read the entire correspondence of Mr. Vidal in 1873 and 1874, he would have discovered that on not less than three different occasions did he exercise the diplomatic powers with which this Government has clothed him for the protection of American citizens.

We pay him $3,000 a year. That is not an exorbitant sum; it is the same which has been paid to the consul at Tripoli for the last twelve or fourteen years; and during one-half of that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was, as he is to-day, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, having charge of these matters. But the gentleman has accomplished his object; he has placed upon record a speech against Christianity which he will take back next year, as he has the speech made against cundurango a year ago.

Mr. COX. I do not think my friend from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] understands the point I made a moment ago. Did I make any point against Christianity? Why, sir, the man who would gather that from my remarks ought to be struck with catalepsy. I made the point that our consul had no business either with Moslemism or Christianity, with Bible societies or the location of our missionaries either in Europe or Africa. The gentleman says that because I made the amende honorable for some little playful remarks a year ago about a minister who had nothing whatever to do with cundurango, that next year I will also make the amende for what I have said to-day about this consular directory of American missionaries in Europe and Africa!

Moreover, to be plain, was there ever such a solemn humbug as to have these consuls at large salaries in these out of the way places writing little essays to Washington and coming into competition in their publishing with observers who make books at their own expense? I have the honor to be the gentleman referred to who went down into this "autochthonic" Touareg country to extract sunbeams. No matter whether my book was good or bad; I paid my own traveling expenses. Nor do I want our paid officers to be writing up this kind of literature, which concerns nothing connected with commerce. It is an outrage upon tax-payers, whether they have any religion or no religion. I want to say to my friend that I went down into that Touareg land of the Atlas—down among the miscellaneous tribes, as far as I could get safely—and I found no American consul to direct me there. They were scarcely ever at their posts, if any posts are needed in Barbary at all. And if I had had trouble as an American citizen, I would have relied upon my own right arm. But why should members laugh? I should not have called for this sort of consuls, who are studying how to propagate the Christian religion out of Bulgaria and into this Touareg country!

I called the attention of the House to this matter in a manner not quite so seriously as is required, but for the purpose of showing what absolute nonsense grave legislators may be guilty of, and especially the nonsense of those who would defend it. And I particularly referred to the gentleman who honors me by sitting to my right, [Mr. ORTH.] Now vote your $3,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Did not the gentleman travel under the protection of the United States?

Mr. COX. I traveled under the protection of my wife. I carried my own flag.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Madagascar, and San Juan del Norte.

Mr. SWANN. In making up this bill the clerk omitted, by an accidental oversight, a certain class of officers. I move to supply the omission by inserting after the line just read the following:

SCHEDULE B.

For the agent and consul-general at Cairo, $4,000.
For the consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio Janeiro, each $6,000 per annum, $24,000.
For the consuls-general at Calcutta and Shanghai, each $5,000 per annum, $10,000.
For the consul-general at Melbourne, $4,500 per annum.
For the consuls-general at Kanagawa, Montreal, and Berlin, each $4,000 per annum, $12,000.
For the consuls-general at Vienna, Frankfort, Rome, and Constantinople, each $3,000 per annum, $12,000.
For the consuls-general at Saint Petersburg and Mexico, each $2,000 per annum, $4,000.
For the consul at Liverpool, $6,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANN. I move further to amend by striking out in lines 63 and 64, on page 4, "$409,700," and inserting "$333,200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance for clerks at consulates, as follows:
To the consul-general at Havana and the consul at Liverpool, each a sum not exceeding the rate of $3,000 for any one year; and to the consuls-general at London, Paris, and Shanghai, each a sum not exceeding the rate of $2,000 for any one year; to the consuls-general at Berlin, Vienna, Frankfort, and Montreal, and to the consuls at Hamburg, Bremen, Leipsic, Lyons, Manchester, Beirut, Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Chemnitz, Sheffield, Sonneberg, Dresden, Havre, Marseilles, Fayal, Nuremberg, Leith, Naples, Stuttgart, and Tunstall, each a sum not exceeding $1,500 for any one year, $49,500.

Mr. ORTH. I move to amend by inserting after "Stuttgart," in line 231, the word "Manheim," so as to allow to the consul at this place clerk hire not exceeding $1,500.

Mr. SWANN. Is that amendment approved by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. ORTH. No, sir; it has never been brought before that committee. I desire to give the information upon which I move the amendment.

Before the revision of our consular system, which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] we had three consulates, one at Carlsruhe, another at Ludwigschafen, and another at Manheim, all in the same immediate vicinity. The revision of last session consolidated those three consulates, continuing a consulate at Manheim but doing away with the consulates at Carlsruhe and Ludwigschafen. The fees received at Carlsruhe for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, were about $2,700; at Ludwigschafen, $1,900; and at Manheim, if I recollect aright, about four or five hundred dollars; making as the total of fees received at those three consulates about $5,000. Those consulates having been consolidated, the result is that the consul now discharging the duties heretofore discharged by three persons gets less than was formally allowed to the consulate at any one of those points, with the exception, I believe, of $500 to which he is entitled under the act of 1856, making his total compensation $2,000.

While this section is before us I wish to make a brief statement for the benefit of members of the committee. We appropriate here not less than $1,500 as clerk hire for the different consulates named in this section. The truth is, however, that the discretion of the Secretary of State with reference to this matter is so exercised that in most cases very little more than half this amount is expended for the purpose. For instance, the consul at Manheim informs me that he can get all the clerk hire he desires at from sixty to seventy-five dollars a month, being about one-half the legal allowance. The question may be asked, why not cut down the allowance to less than $1,500? The reason is that there may be one or two consulates to which the allowance of $1,500 is appropriated, while for quite a number of others—perhaps all the others—from $750 to $1,000 is all that is allowed by the State Department. Upon this statement I hope the Committee on Appropriations will consent to the amendment I suggest.

Mr. GARFIELD. This, I believe, is a case in which three consulates were consolidated.

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I happen to know personally the gentleman who has charge of this consulate. He called on me not long ago, just before he went abroad, and stated that a large share of his work was necessarily correspondence. As he has to perform the duty that was until recently assigned to three consulates, the duties of two at least must be managed by correspondence wholly. I happen to know him to be a most excellent man; and I have full faith in what he says. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs think that Manheim should be added to this list, I should certainly feel disposed to follow their lead in this respect from the fact that I know this officer and have full confidence in his statements.

Mr. ORTH. I wish to state in this connection that I am in receipt of a dispatch this morning from the Department stating that the Department would be disposed to make a moderate allowance to Manheim if authority existed—a "moderate allowance"—probably six or seven hundred dollars.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Without opposing this particular item, for I am not by any means certain that it is not proper, I wish to say that in determining the question last year in relation to these clerks of consuls we made an allowance for clerks at various places—an allowance which would in all probability employ thirty, forty, or fifty clerks. There may be twelve or fourteen of these consular clerks (I am not certain as to the precise number) outside of this appropriation.

Mr. ORTH. Fourteen.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. These consular clerks were appointed in pursuance of law; and it occurred to the committee at that time that the Department could very easily supply any deficiency in the necessary amount of clerkly assistance at any consulate by detailing for that particular consulate some one of these consular clerks. I am not by any means certain it cannot be done yet. Still, as I am tolerably well persuaded that the Secretary of State, in the administration of his office and in the detail of these clerks, intends to send them where they are needed, and as he has recommended an appropriation for clerk hire to be made for this consulate at Manheim, I presume it is all right, and therefore shall make no opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again read. Those who have studied the matter may perhaps be familiar with it, but I should like to hear exactly what the amendment is.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to give clerk hire to another consulate. That is the effect of this amendment; but I am apprehensive my colleague is laying the foundation for very heavy additional expenditures in carrying out our foreign relations in the future in reference to these consulates by the amendment which was proposed by him at the last session of Congress. Considering that he is generally careful of public expenditures, and of the fact that for a series of years this branch of the public service has remained more entirely unchanged than any other, our foreign representatives being paid in coin instead of in paper, and there was no pretense, therefore, for increasing their salaries on account of the depreciation of our money—considering, I say, there has been no material increase in our foreign relations, and that in point of fact, so far as these consulates are concerned, the expenses of the Government should have steadily diminished, because our foreign commerce has not actually increased, that instead of extending the present wide-spread consular system of the Government it should be decreased, still I apprehend, whenever a movement is set afoot to increase the expenditures of a Department of the Government, it is practically impossible to arrest it. I feel such is the case under the present administration of the Government. The first movement of an important character bearing on these expenditures occurred last session. My friend and colleague thought the increased expenditure growing out of the amendments then made would on the whole have the effect not only to add to the efficiency of the service, as he represented, but ultimately to prevent any motive for further increase of expenditure. But here a small item comes in now in reference to this consulate; but where is it to stop? Everybody has known for years past there has been an army of consuls abroad beyond the wants or necessities of the Government; that they have little or no duties to perform; that the examination of their reports shows an expenditure of money without benefit to the Government; that their services are valueless even for the purpose of protecting the rights of American citizens; in short, that there is no more purely fanciful feature of our Government, nothing more entirely imaginary than the supposed benefits arising from the perpetuation of a system which was perhaps good enough for the Middle Ages, and it may be up to the close of the last century, but of no value now except possibly in connection with the commerce of the country.

For one, sir, I regret to see a tendency to increase these expenditures. I regret to see now for the first time such a movement set on foot as there was last session for these increased expenses. It is a notable fact that whenever you begin an expenditure in connection with any Department of the Government it only serves to lay the foundation for other expenses in the same direction in all the other Departments. When the Committee on Foreign Affairs favors such an appropriation as this, the amount being small in this special instance, it is hardly worth while to raise one's voice against it; but I have observed all past increase in our expenditures beyond what seems to be necessary for the administration of the Government began with precisely similar small appropriations from the Treasury, and when once made I have observed furthermore they have grown with startling rapidity, until in the aggregate they have amounted to millions of dollars.

Mr. ORTH. I am sorry to afford any unnecessary pain and uneasiness to my colleague in offering this small amendment to the bill, but I assure him, in answer to his question as to where this thing will stop, that, so far as I know, the increase to this bill will stop with the adoption of this amendment.

But my colleague is mistaken in several things. He ought to know, because he has been earnest in hunting up facts and figures in reference to the operation of the Government, that the bill passed at the last session of Congress has saved this Government no less than $75,000 of money. And he ought to know that instead of the consular system being a burden to the Government, it is a source of revenue, bringing into the Treasury some $240,000 over and above the amount expended. He ought to know such is the fact, and he ought to have so spoken to his people, that instead of being a burden upon us it is actually a source of revenue. Furthermore, the commerce of this country is increasing. The fees returned by our consuls to the State Department exhibit year by year an increase commensurate with the growth of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at my colleague, because for years I have listened to his remarks here in behalf of economy, and I have only to hope, when he and his friends take charge of matters here in a few months more, we will see that spirit of economy manifested in the legislation of the country of which they have given us such boisterous and frequent promise in the last few years. What I asked for here was to correct a mere oversight in last year's legislation. As I have stated, I do not wish to repeat the argument; but my colleague was probably out of his seat when I made the motion. We have consolidated here three consulates into one. The fees are in the neighborhood of $5,000 a year. We are paying to that consul $1,500 a year where we had paid almost three times that amount before. The duties and business of that consulate have increased to such an extent that they have become a severe burden to the man who is occupying the place at the pitiful sum of $1,500. He asks that we shall grant him clerk hire under the discretion of the Department of State. That clerk hire in all human probability will not exceed $750.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is aware that the fact to which he refers of the large fees received holds good only in reference to a few of the important consulates at points where we have very important commercial relations. The consular system as a whole, in connection with our foreign diplomacy, is a very heavy expense to the Government over and above any benefit derived from consular fees. And that the legislation of last session resulted in an increase of the cost of foreign relations I think is clear, and must be clear and beyond question to any one.

I had indulged a hope that my friend would have seen the advantage, not only to the party which now controls the administration of this House but to the country itself, of such a reduction in the appropriations of this present session of Congress as that the reductions when made to such sums as will be necessary for the economical administration of the Government would not be so startling. I would hope that this session, instead of $182,000,000 being appropriated for the current expenses of the Government, a sum approaching the expenditures of six or seven years ago, the expenditures of the year 1867, naturally the most expensive year since the war, should have been reached. But I see no tendency in that direction. And if the country shall be convinced within the next twelve or eighteen months that this Government can be carried on with absolute efficiency in all its Departments upon a reduction of the expenditures of the Government by forty, fifty, or sixty million dollars; if not only the estimates be made, but the country shall be satisfied that such a reduction of the appropriations will not at all embarrass the administration of our public affairs, then I think my friend will be convinced that it was the true policy, not only from the low point of view of partyism but from the high national point of view of the interests of the whole people, that at this session of Congress an honest, sincere effort at retrenchment in expenditures should have been made.

I do not feel any anxiety that any one political party should have exclusively the honor of a sincere effort to bring back the expenditure of this Government to the sum required for its economical and efficient administration. I would rather have seen the republican party, as represented here, proceed in this necessary work of retrenchment and reform than see the work exclusively appropriated by its successors.

Mr. MYERS. I cannot allow to pass without comment the assertion of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that our expenditures for the consular service are, notwithstanding what the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has stated, greater than our receipts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I said, coupled with the cost of our diplomatic relations.

Mr. MYERS. We are treating now of our consular service. I want to say this, which is a fact perhaps not generally known, that our receipts from consular fees average about $200,000 per year more than the expenses for consuls.

Mr. HOLMAN. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars last year.

Mr. MYERS. They average $200,000; but what the amount may be this year, $140,000 or $175,000 or $200,000, the fact stands out that we are receiving from this service far more than we spend. The consular service and the Patent-Office are the only two Departments of the Government, if I may so term them, that are self-sustaining. Yet whenever a proposition comes before the House to give better pay to employés of the Patent-Office, there has always been objection made to it that we are paying too much; and whenever a motion is made to pay to our representatives abroad a compensation which will justify men of ability in going there, and make them have at least a relative position of honor compared with the better paid men of other governments, such a proposition is fought by economical gentlemen like my friend from Indiana, without reason, without justice, I will not say without sense, because my friend has a good deal of that, if he would only exercise it in the right direction.

I have for years, sir, complained that we do not pay our representatives abroad in the consular service sufficient to compensate for the banishment, as it frequently is in these minor consulates, from home, and for expenses which entail debt upon them, so that frequently when they die abroad we have to provide for the benefit of their families for some of the expenses which have been incurred. We do not pay them in proportion to what other nations pay their consular officers. We would elevate our own dignity and honor, and enable them to stand better before other nations if we gave them enough; if we gave them more than a miserable pittance, and sufficient to enable them to appear at least respectable abroad. Now we pay them too low. It was my fond hope that in the reorganization of the consular service last year we should have had a more liberal pay granted to that service and to our representatives abroad.

We had a reorganization; we gave a little more to one man and, as my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] on the committee wanted, a little less to another man, and came before the House and said that we had not altogether increased the expenses of the Government. Why should we fear increasing the expenses of the Government in this regard, especially when this service yields to the Government a revenue and the service was not created for the purpose of obtaining revenue to the Government? Why not pay proper salaries, so that men shall not starve abroad as the representatives of this Government? Many of them come home in an impoverished condition.

Sir, I am glad to say—I am going out of Congress; I am not glad of that, although I am not very sorry—I am glad to say that since I have been in Congress, whenever it has been proposed to give the men we employ proper salaries, whether in clerical positions or the consular service, or whatever position a man might occupy, even members of Congress, my view has been, and I voted and spoke for it, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire;" and it is beneath our dignity to try, in order to obtain an economical reputation, to strike down these men, especially men who are not here to present their own cases, and who get so small a pittance as we give to those engaged in our consular service.

I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw any opposition as to this particular case where my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, has shown him he is wrong. But I speak of the question in general, and I say that, especially as we have a large surplus each year arising from the exertions, the labor, the duties of these men, we should pay them a proper, honorable salary for the services which they perform.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. ORTH, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SWANN. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CORWIN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3911) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SWANN. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw it.

EXPENSES OF THE VISIT OF THE KING OF HAWAII.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Appropriations for passage a bill to pay the expenses of the visit to the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. COX. O, no; do not pass that now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there can be no objection to it. It is a bill in regard to the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The bill was read. It proposes to appropriate $30,000 to defray the expenses attending the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and suite in the United States; that amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State and vouchers to be filed in the Treasury Department, a statement thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will move to change the amount of the appropriation to $25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose it would be rather discourteous to object to such a bill as this; but I will ask the gentleman if he has a list of items, or whether this is the estimated amount of the expenses?

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the estimated amount. Of course we cannot have a bill of items. I am willing to answer any other questions that gentlemen desire to ask.

Mr. HEREFORD. When the gentleman asked leave to introduce this bill a few days ago I objected to its introduction, and I stated then that I would continue to object to it, certainly until there was a report from the Secretary of State as to what was done with the Japanese fund. We appropriated $50,000 on that occasion, and by the act which I hold in my hand, approved February 2, 1872, it was made the duty of the Secretary of State to report to this House what was done with that $50,000, and no such report has been made up to this day.

Mr. GARFIELD. In accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman I wrote to the Secretary of State, and somewhat to my mortification I will confess he referred me to a document of the Forty-second Congress containing a report of the expenditure of that fund, and to another document of the Forty-third Congress containing a supplementary report, accounting for the expenditure of $25,700. The whole matter of the items of expense were passed through the Treasury on regular vouchers in the ordinary way, and the entire sum remaining unexpended was covered into the Treasury in July last in accordance with general law.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have inquired at the proper place, the document-room, for such a report, and after a thorough investigation was informed that no such report had been made. At all events I have been unable to find it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will find it in the appendix to the Book of Estimates of last year, reported among the items of expenditure of that year. That is where I found it. I call attention to the communications from the State Department upon the subject.

The communications were as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 21, 1874.

SIR: I transmit a draught of a joint resolution for appropriating $25,000 for the expenses of the King of the Hawaiian Kingdom and suite as the guests of the nation.

I beg leave to refer you to the following similar resolutions on kindred occasions which have been consulted in preparing the inclosed draught, viz: One approved April 19, 1860, providing $50,000 for the expenses of the first Japanese embassy not then arrived, (Statutes, volume 12, page 115,) and one approved February 2, 1872, appropriating $50,000 for the expenses of the second embassy from Japan, (Statutes, volume 17, page 30.)

The expenditures for the Chinese embassy, of which Mr. Burlingame was the head, were defrayed from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse; and the account thereof having been settled according to law upon the certificate of the President for the time being, this Department possesses no account of the specific purposes to which it was applied.

The appropriation now suggested is recommended as advisable and expedient, in view of our relations with the Hawaiian Kingdom.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Inclosure: Draught of joint resolution.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., December 22, 1874.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD:

The amount mentioned in my letter of yesterday should read $30,000 instead of $25,000. Please make the correction.

HAMILTON FISH.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have moved to reduce the amount to $25,000, as the Secretary of State thinks he can get along with $5,000 less than the amount called for by the bill.

Mr. FIELD. I object to this bill at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move that the rules be suspended so as to pass this bill with the amendment I have indicated.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and being taken by a viva voce vote,

The SPEAKER said: The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rules, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAGER. I present the memorial of Louis Rose, a citizen of San Diego, in the State of California. Mr. Rose complains that he has been deprived of certain lands that he held in the town of San Diego by the Government of the United States. San Diego was a Mexican pueblo, and was entitled, under the Mexican laws, to four square leagues of land. This title was recognized by the land commission and confirmed by a judicial decree. The ayuntamiento, under the Mexican system of laws, conveyed certain portions of this pueblo land to Mr. Rose. Long after the confirmation by the court the authorities of the United States took possession of the lands that had been conveyed to him, for the purposes of fortifications. He had built a wharf, at a large expense, on this land, and has been deprived of the use of his wharf and of his land by the Government, who, as I have stated, have taken possession of it for purposes of fortifications. The Government recognized the title of the town of San Diego to these municipal lands, and made a purchase of a certain portion for the site of these fortifications, but extended beyond the boundaries they had purchased and took into their possession that which is claimed to be the private property of Louis Rose.

The memorial relates to a private land claim as between the Government and Mr. Rose. I therefore ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, with the exhibits which I send to the Chair.

It was so referred.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to present a memorial of citizens of Wayne County, Iowa, remonstrating against the removal of the United States court from Keokuk to Burlington; which I ask to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire to say, now that I have the floor, that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill to abolish the western district of Arkansas. I shall make one more effort to have that bill disposed of immediately after the disposition of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS presented additional papers in relation to the pension claim of Abraham Ellis, late lieutenant and quartermaster, &c., for United States troops in the State of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of William Maxwell Wood, of Washington, District of Columbia, asking the payment of $15,000 for the present and future use on all Government vessels of "boat detaching and attaching apparatus" invented and patented by him; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of 500 citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, late employés of the navy-yard and others, praying such legislation as will warrant their steady employment in the Government yards; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOGY presented a petition of Fleming Cramp and William Williamston, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered the United States in the Yellowstone expedition in 1824-'25; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of Louis J. Barbot, civil engineer, William Hume, G. W. Amory, Street Brothers, Rutledge & Young, Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., and others, of South Carolina, asking the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3656) for the construction of a transportation route from some point on the Union Pacific Railroad to London, England; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 964) to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 268) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Champion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3825) to amend the national-bank act, and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners, reported it with an amendment.

PRESENT TO MRS. FITCH FROM THE KHEDIVE OF EGYPT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) authorizing Thomas W. Fitch, engineer of the United States Navy, to accept of a wedding present sent to his wife, Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch. I presume there can be no objection to it, and therefore I shall ask for its present consideration. This was a present sent by the Khedive of Egypt to the daughter of General Sherman as a wedding present. The husband of Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch is an engineer of the United States Navy, and it requires therefore an act of Congress in order to allow him to receive it.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was read three times and passed. It authorizes Thomas W. Fitch, engineer of the United States Navy, to accept of a wedding present of jewelry sent to his wife, Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch, by the Khedive of Egypt as a token of respect.

TESTIMONY IN REVENUE-FRAUD CASES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874, to report it back, with an amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration on account of the pressing nature of the case. As soon as the bill is taken up I shall have a letter read explaining it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It declares that nothing in the nineteenth section of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," passed June 22, 1874, shall be construed to affect any authority, power, or right which might theretofore have been lawfully exercised by any court, judge, or district attorney of the United States to obtain the testimony of an accomplice in any crime against or fraud upon the customs-revenue laws on any trial or proceeding for a fine, penalty, or forfeiture under those laws, by a discontinuance or dismissal, or by an engagement to discontinue or dismiss any proceedings against such accomplice.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was in line 5 to strike out the word "passed" and insert "approved."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say a word in explanation before I have the letter read. The nineteenth section of the moiety act of the last session has embarrassed the officers of the law, judges of the courts, and district attorneys, in the disposal of cases pending before them, and especially in releasing some parties where it is necessary to make them witnesses. As the letter which I shall have read will explain the difficulties sought to be corrected by this bill, I shall have the letter read, stating also that it is warmly approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, who has called my attention to it and urges the immediate passage of the act. I ask that the letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES
FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
New York, January 4, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my conversation with you on Saturday, I beg to put in writing the substance of what I said.

The nineteenth section of the "moiety bill," so called, of last winter is as follows:

"That it shall not be lawful for any officer or officers of the United States to compromise or abate any claim of the United States arising under the customs laws, for any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred by a violation thereof; and any officer or person who shall so compromise or abate any such claim, or attempt to make such compromise or abatement, or in any manner relieve or attempt to relieve from such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and be fined not exceeding $10,000: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or to compromise the same, in accordance with existing law."

This section, and especially the words underlined, seem to require an interpretation which I believe was never intended, and which should be, in my opinion, promptly remedied. The section is believed to take from the district attorney the power to use one conspirator as a witness against another in customs cases, for to do so there must either be a direct promise of immunity, or—what comes to the same thing—the courts will not allow a person who has been so used to be put upon trial. The result is, therefore, that a district attorney who should do this would relieve or attempt to relieve such person from a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, and would subject himself to the punishment imposed by the section.

The closing clause, preserving the remitting power of the Secretary of the Treasury, does not relieve the matter, for that power never extended to criminal cases.

The interpretation I have stated or given to the section is that given by Judges Woodruff, Blatchford, and Benedict. It is also that given, I understand, by the district attorneys of Massachusetts, Maine, and Vermont, if not others. The Attorney-General has given an opinion to the contrary. There is, therefore, to say the least, a very undesirable difference of opinion.

I cannot suppose that any such result was intended by the law-making power. The result certainly is to secure immunity from conviction where otherwise it could and would be obtained, for no district attorney could be expected to run the risk of being held to have violated the section; so that though the construction given by the Attorney-General may be eventually held to be the correct one, until that is judicially established (which is not from the nature of the case likely to be ever done) the contrary construction will be the one adopted in practice.

If you and the Committee on Ways and Means shall concur with me in these views, I beg to suggest the passage of a declaratory resolution something in the form of that inclosed. I adopt this form because, if the correction is to be applied, it should be done at once. I desire to use accomplices as witnesses in cases to be tried within ten days, and I suppose a resolution can be formed more rapidly than a bill. Moreover, it would probably pass unaffected by any views as to other portions of the moiety act.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE BLISS,
United States Attorney.

Hon. JOHN A. KASSON.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to this measure, and only express my surprise that it should have been thought necessary. I am surprised that it should be thought necessary to pass an act termed there a declaratory act. But this is not a declaratory act; it is simply an act restrictive of the scope and operation of former laws. I shall have no objection to this bill, merely saying that I cannot understand how, under a general penal law, a court should have been supposed to be deprived of the power to order a discontinuance of proceedings against one of the parties charged before it jointly with others, for the purpose of making him a competent witness or for any purpose of obtaining testimony of that kind. Such matters have been always discretionary in courts from time immemorial, and this is the first time it has been thought necessary to enact a special law permitting a certain class of offenders, indicted jointly with others, to have their cases severed in order that they might be used as witnesses for the prosecution of their coconspirators. I make no objection to the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was disposed in the first instance to agree to the construction put upon this law by the Attorney-General and also by the Senator from Delaware; but it must be remembered that very respectable judges, like the circuit judge in New York and of several of the Eastern States, have put a different construction on it, and after a careful examination of the law I am inclined to think their construction is correct, and therefore the necessity of passing this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1117) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Eddy, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1118) to incorporate the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes; whith was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1119) for the relief of James Millinger, of New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1120) for the relief of Miss Rebecca L. Wright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARKANSAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas. There will be no trouble about it now, I think.

Mr. PRATT. I shall interpose no objection to the present consideration of the bill which my friend from Iowa wishes to have considered this morning; but I give notice that after that is disposed of this morning, if practicable, or if not this morning on to-morrow morning after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands on March last, ceding to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of unsurveyed lakes and other bodies of water. I wish to submit some observations upon the merits of that bill to the Senate, and desire to take the earliest occasion to do that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no doubt the Senator will have time to-day, after the Senate disposes of the bill which I have moved to take up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. The original bill and substitute have both been read. I submit that the substitute, as offered by the committee, be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on the Judiciary report to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That the judge of the district court for the eastern district of Arkansas shall hold the terms of the district court now provided by law in the western as well as in the eastern district of said State; and all judicial powers now exercised by, or conferred upon, the judge of said western district are hereby conferred upon, and shall be exercised by, the judge of said eastern district of Arkansas; and all acts and parts of acts providing for the appointment of a district judge for said western district of Arkansas are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That section 2153 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"In executing process in the Indian country, the marshal may call to his aid, to assist in executing process by arresting and bringing in prisoners from the Indian country, one person, when necessary, or two, when the judge of his district shall certify, in writing, that two are necessary; and they shall each be allowed for their services, in lieu of all expenses, three dollars per day. When two are deemed insufficient, the marshal shall apply for aid to the nearest commanding officer of the Army, whose duty it shall be to furnish the men."

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the question is taken on that amendment, I have a section to offer by way of addition to it and for its perfection; I offer it at this time so that the question may be taken on the whole substitute at once:

SEC. 3. That the counties of Benton, Washington, Crawford, Sebastian, Scott, Polk, Sevier, Howard, Montgomery, Sarber, Franklin, Johnson, Madison, Newton, Carroll, Boone, and Marion, in said State of Arkansas, together with all that part of the Indian country described in and included by the act entitled "An act to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts," approved March 3, 1851, shall constitute the western judicial district; and the residue of said State shall constitute the eastern district of said State.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to say that the objections I raised to the substitute reported by the committee a few days ago are entirely removed by the amendment just offered by the Senator from Iowa; and I desire to say further, that among the first bills introduced by myself in this body, some four years ago, was a bill of a similar character to this which is now under consideration, including the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. I think it is unfortunate that action was not taken earlier upon this matter; but I am satisfied that the bill, if amended in the way now proposed, will meet all the considerations raised for the benefit of the public service. I can say for myself, and I think I can say for my colleagues in this and the other House, that it meets our entire and hearty approval as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Iowa. I hope it will pass.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Arkansas takes his seat I hope he will explain an apparent anomaly, or at least contradiction, between the substitue and the amending section. As I understand the substitute to the bill, it proposes to abolish the western district of Arkansas. The amended section which the Senator from Iowa has offered this morning proposes to constitute a new western district out of several counties of Arkansas and the country known as the Indian Territory.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator is under a misapprehension, I think; but perhaps the Senator from Iowa who proposed the substitute had better answer the question.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill as originally introduced provided for abolishing the western district of Arkansas entirely as to the judge, the district attorney, and the marshal also. The substitute proposes to repeal all laws that provide for the appointment of a judge for such district. But before the appointment of a judge under the act of 1871 there was a western district of Arkansas, and for that district there were provided a marshal and a district attorney. The original bill proposed to abolish that western district entirely, and have but one district in Arkansas. The substitute proposes to retain the law as it stood before the act of 1871, so far as a marshal and district attorney are concerned, and repeals all laws providing for the appointment of a judge. It occurs that under the act of 1871 certain counties were attached to the western district as established by the act of 1851, and this last section proposes in substance to restore the boundaries of the western district as they stood under the act of 1851 and before the passage of the act of 1871.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator to believe that if this measure concerned the State of Arkansas alone, I should hesitate to interpose any objection whatever to its consideration; but if I understand the object of the measure proposed by the Senator from Iowa, it not only abolishes the western district of Arkansas but consolidates the State of Arkansas with the Indian Territory into one judicial district, making a territorial area of something like one hundred and twenty thousand square miles and embracing a jurisdiction that comprises not only the interests of the people of Arkansas but those of the civilized Indian nations in the Indian country and also those of the barbarous or savage tribes whose reservations have been placed in that country by executive order.

It appears to me that this is exceedingly unjust. It is unjust, in the first place, to the judge who sits upon that bench, because it imposes upon him duties that he is entirely unable to perform; it is unjust to the people of Arkansas, because it deprives them of the possibility of a speedy adjudication of their cases before that bench; and it is unjust to the people of the Indian country, because there is a condition of disorder there, there is a condition of violence and disturbance there which the present judicial system is entirely unable to deal with.

In view of this position which I take, I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa having this bill in charge, and of the Senator from Arkansas, who is specially interested, to this communication from the grand jurors of the western district of Arkansas, the district attorneys of the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, and the judge who sits upon the bench, in regard to the question now before the Senate, which I have received this morning:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, members of the grand jury serving at the November term, 1874, of the United States court for the western district of Arkansas, beg leave to present that from our personal knowledge as citizens of said district and from information coming to our knowledge as such jurors we are convinced beyond all doubt that the best interests of the Indians, negroes, and whites now in the Territory imperatively demand that said Territory should be opened to white settlers and given a territorial government. There is now no court in which civil justice can be administered in that country between the Indians and whites and negroes, and hence parties take the law in their own hands in many cases, and out of this grow many criminal prosecutions. The court at Fort Smith is the only one invested with criminal jurisdiction over that country, and its criminal jurisdiction is special and limited; and by reason of the vast extent of territory and the absence of local officers the administration of criminal justice in this court is necessarily very imperfect, and is totally inadequate to afford proper protection to life and property. We therefore earnestly recommend that a proper local government be given to the people of that country.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

A. J. HALE,
Foreman of the Grand Jury.

* * * * * * *

Then follow the signatures of the grand jurors, nineteen in number, and of— * * * * *

S. R. HARRINGTON,
United States Attorney Eastern District Arkansas.
WILLIAM H. H. CLAYTON,
United States Attorney Western District Arkansas.

The authenticity of these signatures is certified under the hand and seal of the clerk of that court. Appended to these are the signatures of the petit jurors at the same term of that court, likewise authenticated by the signature and seal of the clerk; but now I call attention to the statement of the judge of that district appended to this petition:

The statements made in the foregoing petition are true. There is no court in that country having jurisdiction to administer civil justice between the Indians and whites and negroes. This state of things leads to attempts to enforce supposed civil rights by forcible means, and this of course usually results in riots, bloodshed, and murder. Owing to the territorial extent of the country and the character of its population, it is quite impossible to secure a successful administration of criminal justice in the United States court at Fort Smith, and besides the jurisdiction of that court is limited and special and powerless to afford proper protection to life and property in that country.

HENRY C. CALDWELL,
Acting United States District Judge Western District Arkansas.

Mr. President, I feel a great deal of interest in this subject, because it very nearly concerns the welfare of a large portion of the people of my own State; and, as I said, if the matter concerned the State of Arkansas alone, I should be among the last to offer any objection to the passage of this bill; but I have introduced a bill which is now pending before the Judiciary Committee to organize the judicial district of Oklahoma and provide for United States courts in that district; and what I submit is this: that the importance and gravity of this question demand that the whole subject be considered together. There should be a court organized in that district; and it is unjust to the people of Arkansas and to the people of the Indian Territory to abolish the western district of Arkansas, attaching that Territory to the State of Arkansas, without at the same time dealing with the whole question and making provisions for a court in that Territory.

With these views I think that the passage of this bill at the present time is objectionable, and that the committee owe it to those people to take the whole subject into consideration and let us deal with it at once as its importance deserves.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I think what the Senator from Kansas said during the first portion of his remarks would apply with more force were it proposed to pass the original House bill which came to this body. In reference to the communication he has read from the grand jurors of the western district of Arkansas and some of the officers of the court, if I understood that communication correctly, it seems to me that it was based upon the proposition to open the Indian country for settlement.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will pardon me. It is not only based upon that, but it contains the further allegation that the present constitution of the courts is such that the administration both of civil and criminal justice is entirely impossible.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; but it starts out by proposing to open that country for settlement. That is a separate and distinct proposition, which I do not know but that I might, upon a separate measure, justify and sustain; but upon this bill I do not think we can raise it.

Now, so that this question may be understood, I desire to allude somewhat to the history of this western district of Arkansas. Up to 1851 there was but one judicial district in Arkansas, embracing the entire State of Arkansas and the Indian Territory. In 1851 the necessity became so great for an additional district that a bill was introduced providing for the western district of Arkansas. That bill provided for composing that district of nearly the same territory which this bill proposes with the amendment now pending. The bill was passed through both Houses without any opposition. For twenty years that status of affairs continued, giving perfect satisfaction to everybody, so far as I know. In 1871 a bill was passed through Congress providing for the appointment of an additional judge for the western district of Arkansas and adding to the western district additional territory. There I think is where our trouble commenced. I think that bill ought never to have passed; and I say now that the bill pending here at this time, with the amendment moved, proposes to restore essentially the status of affairs which existed prior to the passage of the act of 1871. It proposes to take away from the immense territory now composing the western district of Arkansas a portion of it and restore it back to the eastern district, where it properly belongs. It leaves about sixteen counties of the State of Arkansas attached to the western district. That I think you will find will be necessary, from the fact that, as the Indian Territory is now governed, there will be difficulty in getting jurors from the Indians if you have no other territory attached to the district from which you can draw your jurors. From these sixteen counties in the State of Arkansas, with the court at Fort Smith, immediately on the boundary of the Indian Territory and in close proximity to the main portion of the population of that Territory, you are enabled to get your jurors, both grand and petit, for the trial of cases that may come before that court.

I do not think that we can do better at present than to pass this bill. If hereafter the Indian Territory should be opened for white settlement, or if some other system should be adopted for the government of that Territory, then it may be that you may consolidate the portion of the Territory that is taken from Arkansas with the eastern district and make one district of Arkansas and one of the Indian Territory; but as matters now stand in that Territory I do not think it would be wise to do this at this time. I do not know but that the time may come, and it may be now, when we may take into consideration the question of establishing a court in the Indian Territory; but I think that you would be met with great difficulty when you came to draw from the Indians your jurors to try cases arising in that Territory; and therefore I repeat that I do not think we can do better at this time than adopt this amendment and pass this bill as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not propose to be drawn away from the real question at issue at this present time. The question as to the territorial organization of the Indian Territory and the government of that Territory in its civil capacity, is not now before the Senate. I shall be prepared to deal with it when it arises.

Mr. CLAYTON. I submit to my friend that that question is before the Senate by virtue of the communication which he has just read.

Mr. INGALLS. My understanding was that the bill reported by the Senator from Iowa was before the Senate and that the communication which I have read was merely an argument in relation to that subject; and as I have said before the reference to the government of that Territory and the condition of the tribes in that Territory was merely incidental. I read it for the purpose of showing to the Senate the necessity for an organization of courts in that Territory, and for the purpose of showing the inadequacy of this measure now proposed by the Senator from Iowa in dealing with that subject.

But, sir, there seems to be a trifle of disingenuousness in this matter. If I understand the position correctly, it is this: There has been a judge of the western district of Arkansas who has resigned. The district continues to be organized as before. The judge of the eastern district of that State is now acting as the judge of the western district, and will continue to act so whether the bill passes or not. I am therefore at a loss to understand—and I hope the Senator will explain to the Senate—in what manner the passage of this bill will, in any measure whatever, relieve the difficulties that there exist. What is the necessity for the abolition of the western district while the judge of the eastern district continues to act as the judge of that district, and, therefore, of the whole State?

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator will permit me, and it does not interfere with him, I will answer his question now. If this bill does not pass, it will then become necessary for the President to appoint an additional judge for the western district of Arkansas.

Mr. INGALLS. Why?

Mr. CLAYTON. For the simple reason that the law of 1871 will still be in effect, providing for the apppointment of a judge for the western district of Arkansas. I call his attention to that fact, and he will see that he is mistaken, that whether this bill passes or not, the status will remain.

Mr. INGALLS. When is the President called upon to exercise that power?

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose he will exercise it as soon as he ascertains what the Congress of the United States are going to do about that district.

Mr. INGALLS. Why has it not been exercised previously?

Mr. CLAYTON. For the simple reason that a bill had passed the lower House providing for the abolition of the district, and I presume he exercised a wise discretion. I suppose he thought perhaps he had better wait to see if that bill would become a law before he undertook to fill the vacancy.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope the Senators will allow me now to say a word. The western district of Arkansas was established by the act of 1851, but no judge was provided for that district by the act of 1851 or by any act until 1871. Then a judge was appointed for that district. At the last session of Congress, and the last day before the adjournment, that judge resigned and no judge has been appointed for that district since. If this session of Congress shall pass without some action repealing the law providing for the appointment of such judge, then there will be a judge appointed, and it is for the very purpose of obviating that necessity that this bill is proposed.

The bill does not change the law as it stood up to 1871 in any respect whatever, but leaves the matter precisely as it was under the law of 1851. But under the act of 1871 certain counties in the eastern portion of Arkansas were added to the western district, and the law of 1871 provided for the appointment of a judge for the western district. Now, this substitute as it stands proposes to restore the boundaries of the western district as they stood by the act of 1851, and also to repeal the law which provides for the appointment of a judge. It leaves them a district attorney and a marshal, as they were entitled to under the act of 1851, and puts the territory of the western district as it stood by the act of 1851.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Iowa what possible objection there can be to the passage of a bill that shall deal with this whole subject as its importance demands?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is the same objection that there is in any bill that you might present, including in it matters not connected with it. When you reach the entire question, this is the only matter that was before the committee when this bill was reported, as it was at the last session of Congress. At that time there were no such questions as the Senator presents before the committee, and they made the report at that time. Now the Senator suggests that we take into consideration other and different matters, that have no connection with the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The condition of the Indian Territory is certainly very deeply concerned in the consideration of this bill. I call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that there are in that Territory, which is affected by this bill, five civilized nations of Indians, who occupy that country under the provisions of what are known as the treaties of 1866 and 1867, which especially provide in express terms for the organization of courts in that country. There is a condition of violence and of disorder and of lawlessness prevailing there at the present time which renders the carrying out of these provisions essential now. Within a very few days the representatives of these five nations have assembled; they have sent their commissioners here to Washington, and they are here now, urging the establishment of courts in that country having civil and criminal jurisdiction; and so far as the objection presented by the Senator from Arkansas is concerned, touching the impossibility of securing jurors for the administration of justice, I beg to say to him that from the best information I am able to obtain there are among those nations a sufficiently large number of intelligent and educated men to render the administration of justice and the securing of jurors a matter about which there will be no difficulty whatever.

Therefore I say that this bill at the present time, urged as it is with so much pertinacity and without any adequate reason being given for it, based upon a mere technicality, based upon a contingency that may or may not exist, appears to me to need some further explanation, and I hope that the Senate will not do the injustice to the inhabitants of Arkansas, to the judge of that district, to the Indians in that Territory, and to the people of my own State, of passing this bill until they have had the opportunity of considering the whole subject that is involved in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the whole subject were involved in the bill there would be considerable force in what my honorable friend from Kansas states; but it appears to the committee and has appeared to them that the whole subject is not involved in the bill. As the law now stands, without any new legislation at all, the Indian Territory is attached for judicial purposes to the western district of Arkansas, and this bill leaves the Indian Territory exactly where it finds it. It does not undertake to change the law in that respect.

The whole gravamen of the bill—if you can use such a term as applied to legislation—lies in the fact that it reorganizes the western district of Arkansas, to which the Indian Territory is attached, and that is all; so that the Indian question is not made better and it is not made worse as it respects the organization of the courts; and the necessity for this bill is to get rid of the judicial characters who have hitherto occupied the judicial stations in the western district of Arkansas, and to prevent the necessity of appointing others in their place.

Mr. INGALLS. Are not the judicial characters to whom the Senator alludes already got rid of?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, they are not, except in one sense. In the personnel and present sense of the identical men who occupied those stations, they are; but in respect of the duty of the United States to fill up the existing vacancy by the appointment of a judge the moment the President sees that Congress has failed to act upon the subject, we have not got rid of that.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Vermont intend to imply that the President will necessarily appoint a bad judge, or an improper incumbent of the office?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the Senator from Vermont does not intend to imply anything of that kind; but he does intend to imply that the President will appoint an unnecessary judge, who ought to be gotten rid of.

Mr. INGALLS. Was the Senator in when I read the communication from the present judge?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was. I think I comprehended it, and I am going on to state about it, and I think to the satisfaction of my friend, if he will be kind enough to listen to me.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator need not beg my pardon. I do not complain of it at all, quite the reverse, because I know he has the public interest in view just as we have; only we have studied this subject in connection with the points that belong to it, as it respects the State of Arkansas, and we simply leave the Indian Territory exactly where we find it for the time being.

It will be the duty of the President of the United States—if we do not act upon this subject in this Congress, so that all these bills fail—to fill up that office; because the President of the United States, in my opinion, has no authority to let a long period of time go by in respect to filling up a life-station like that of a judge. It would be a usurpation of power, so to speak, although he does not act, and perhaps that is an inaccurate phrase in the technical sense, but the Senate knows what I mean—he would not be justified in doing it. Therefore I assume he will fill it up, I assume he will appoint the best man he can find; but we do not want the man. Experience has demonstrated that the present judge can go on with the whole business and can fulfill all the functions that the present state of things admits of.

Now I come to what my friend has read in this memorial. You will have noticed that this memorial has two objects in view—I do not now speak of what the judge certifies, but the memorial proper—one is to open that Indian Territory to settlement, as it is called. That is what the railway land-grant people have been urging upon us for many years. They have from the United States contingent and conditional land grants; and just as soon as we open that Territory for settlement and dissolve its exclusive character as Indian Territory, just so soon these gentlemen will claim that their land grants will attach, the Indian possessors will be turned out, and they will get the benefit of the performance.

Now, sir, it is open to very grave doubt—I will not say more now—because I do not wish to prejudge the question, whether Congress ought to take any step which would make haste in that direction.

In the next place, if you open this Territory to settlers, you have practically dissolved these Indian communities and have turned loose upon them, without any of the restraints which have hitherto been thought necessary to protect them in their own efforts of self-development and self-progress—you will have turned loose upon them, as I say, that body of people who are generally first to rush into an open territory to speculate in lands and lay out and build railroads, and sell whisky, and so forth and so on. It is open to grave doubt whether that is wise. I do not wish to prejudge it; I only wish to warn Senators not to be in a hurry about it.

Then, what do we come to? We come down to a topic that my friend is quite right in adverting to, that has an incidental but not a direct connection with this one; and that is the question as to whether the public interests and the interests of the Indians cannot be better subserved by establishing a judicial court in that Territory and cutting it loose from Arkansas altogether. I can tell the honorable Senator that the Judiciary Committee is at this present time carefully investigating the circumstances surrounding that subject upon the bill which he has sent to us, and I think I can say now for one that so far as my present information goes, without committing myself, it strikes me with great favor. I am sure the Judiciary Committee will act upon the subject as an independent one at this session. Therefore I submit to him whether it is not the wise and proper thing now to take care of Arkansas, which is really all there is before us, for all that relates to the Indian Territory is just the law now, and then we shall take care of the Indian Territory in the appropriate way. And, as I say, it now strikes me with the limited information I have, because I do not wish to say absolutely in advance that there is very considerable, if not entirely, satisfactory merit in what the Senator has proposed or something like it. I hope, therefore, that he will withdraw his opposition to the passage of this bill, feeling assured that the subject which he has at heart and which we have at heart, of establishing a judicial court for that country, will be brought up presently for consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. I should regret to have the impression made upon the mind of the Senator or upon the mind of the Senate that in reading the communication which has been placed in my hands this morning I am in any way whatever committed to what is known as the territorialization of the Indian country. I read what the memorial contained upon that subject, because it would have been disingenuous to have omitted it, because I had no right to omit it, because it was in the memorial, and if I had not read all that the memorial contained the signers could have complained of an act of injustice on my part. But, sir, I presented this memorial to the Senate for the purpose of showing the opinion of the grand jurors, of the petit jurors, of the district attorneys, and of the judge of that State upon the question of the necessity of organizing a court there. That was the purpose I had in view, and I trust the Senator from Vermont does not intend to leave upon the mind of any person the impression that I am in any way committed to the territorialization of that country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. I did not know that I said anything which would leave that impression. Certainly I did not entertain it myself. I quite understood the motive of my honorable friend in reading the whole memorial and in speaking in reference to the memorial.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, one word further in regard to the arguments advanced by the Senator from Vermont. If I understand his position, it is this: that this bill should be passed, because unless it is passed the necessity will devolve upon the President of appointing a judge to the vacant bench in the western district of Arkansas. Is that the case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I am unable to see the bearing that has on this subject, because, as is apparent from the statements already made by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Arkansas, the whole jurisdiction in that country is now exercised without difficulty and without controversy by the incumbent judge there.

What is to be gained, Mr. President, by the passage of this bill? There is no necessity imminent for the appointment of another judge. The whole jurisdiction is exercised to-day without objection from anybody; and therefore why not leave this incidental question, as I must still think it is, until the whole matter can be considered by the committee and a bill framed which will deal with the whole subject of that most interesting and great jurisdiction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] is before the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust we may have a vote on this measure now. I hope no further discussion will be had upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

An act devolving additional duties upon the judge of the eastern district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3911) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] is before the Senate, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds, I would like to present a petition signed by a large number of persons resident in the county of Washington, who are tax-payers, stating "that at the organization of the late District government the rate of taxation for the county was only one-half that for the city of Washington, and that then the said county was free from indebtedness; that the resources of said county are solely agricultural, and the total product value thereof, according to the census of 1870, was only about $85,000, having to compete in this market with the farm products of Maryland, whereon taxation was merely nominal, and that up to this date the amount of said agricultural product has not materially increased; that nearly one-third in assessable value of the improved real estate of said county is owned by the United States Government and by large corporations, and is therefore exempt from taxation; that said county, not being supplied with water or gas and having no benefit from the fire department, should be free from taxation therefor; that of the police, public school, and poor taxation, and general administrative expenses the proportion of said county should be small, and has heretofore been assessed at but about one-fifteenth of the expenses for the entire District;" that for road taxation, they claim "that said county is chargeable with only one-half of the cost of improvement and repairs of the several public roads leading to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, excepting those known as the 'canal' and 'new-cut' roads, which by act of Congress are made forever chargeable to Georgetown." On this state of facts they pray "that these facts may be considered in any proposed legislation for the District of Columbia, and that in such legislation the taxation for the county of Washington may be restricted to an aggregate assessment not exceeding seventy-five cents on the one hundred dollars on the present assessment valuation."

I venture to take this occasion to remark, in almost a single sentence, that it seems to me in justice to the people of this District that some form of government should soon be adopted. One fact alone is sufficient to show this, and that is, that there is a 3 per cent. annual tax upon the people of this District, when the Government owns one-half at least of all the property within it, and is not paying anything toward the expenses of the District. I say not paying anything, scarcely paying a dollar; here and there incidentally it pays a little; instead of paying as it should, about one-half of the expenses of running this District, by a system of machinery perhaps not designed for that end it was relieved last year, and if legislation does not take place this year it will be relieved from contributing anything to the expenses of the District—expenses which it ought to pay; and I think in merest justice to the people who have their property here the Government, which is so large a property-holder and which heretofore has recognized its obligation to do something toward the payment of the expenses of running affairs here, should pay a portion of these expenses, and proper legislation should be had to that end. As the bill referred to has been reported, I ask that the petition be printed without the names and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) That order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 743) to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 744) to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia; and

A bill (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2419) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, now that the great wind has passed by, and the earthquake is stilled, and the fire has ceased to burn, I wonder if the Senate will listen to a "still, small voice," for a moment. It must be manifest, I think, to all that the republican side of this Chamber enters upon this debate under great disadvantage. If republicans had planned the January campaign in New Orleans, we should have been prepared with our speeches for the elucidation of it. We could have prepared them during the holiday recess. But to us these events come as a surprise. We are not yet officially informed what the actual events were, as they transpired in New Orleans on the 4th of this month. I shall confine myself, therefore, mainly to some observations that have already been made touching those events. And first, I wish to address a word to my distinguished friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] who was the last on that side to address the Senate on this topic. I listened to him, as I always listen to him, with interest; I admired, as every one must have admired, his glittering, if somewhat gauzy periods. The Senator spoke to us, if we can credit his own advertisement, from a standpoint which I do not venture to assume. He advertised himself as elevated away above the reach of faction. He had put all party ties and all political aspirations behind him. He clothed himself in the garb of neutrality, if not of serene indifferentism. And yet from that elevated point the Senator screamed to the country two charges against the party to which I belong, charges as monstrous and I believe as groundless as he could possibly fabricate if he had dedicated to the work not merely a holiday recess but a summer vacation.

What are those charges which rang through his whole speech of yesterday? First, that a detachment of the Army—I am going to repeat what I understand him to have argued; of course not to repeat what he said; I cannot do that justice, for I cannot repeat it so well as he did himself—what I understood him to argue was, first, that on the 4th of January a detachment of the Army of the United States removed from the Legislature of a State certain members of the body; that it was done in pursuance of the orders of General Sheridan under the direction of the President of the United States acting in the name and on the behalf of the republican party of the country. The Senator tells me he did not say anything of the kind. I told him I was not going to repeat what he said but the course of his argument, and that was the first accusation as I understood it; and the second one was worse than that, to wit, that the republican party of the country encouraged the murder of republicans in one section of the country that we might be afforded a pretext for crushing the liberties of the country. The Senator says he did not say that. If he did not argue those two propositions, I misunderstood him. The Senator says I misunderstood him. I have not heard him during the session make a declaration that does me so much good as that. I am glad to be told that I misunderstood him.

I did not misunderstand him upon one point, however. I was not mistaken in thinking that he said that a detachment of the Army of the United States removed from the Legislature of a State certain members of the body on the 4th of January, and I do think he undertook to convey to the Senate the idea that General Sheridan, being in New Orleans at the time, was responsible for that act, and that the President, having sent General Sheridan to New Orleans, was responsible also, and in some occult way that the republican party was responsible for what the President did. Now I wish to dispose of this matter so far as it appeared in the speech of yesterday, by reminding the Senate first that the republican party did not instruct the President to do anything whatever in New Orleans on the 4th of January; that party was never consulted about it, knew nothing of it.

I did not attempt to repeat or reply to what the Senator from Missouri said. I was speaking to an argument which I understood him to have made. Just so far as he withdraws that argument he discharges a duty that I assigned to myself, or rather saves me from that duty, for I shall not have to answer it. But to show that I did not very much misunderstand the scope of his argument, I beg leave to do what I did not intend to do at all, read two brief extracts from what he said as it appears in the RECORD this morning. After he had stated what he understood to have been done on the 4th of January, he said:

The question is, where is the law from which the National Government, in case of threatening trouble in a State, derives its power to invade the legislative body of that State by armed force, and to drag out persons seated there as members that others may take their places? Where is that law, I ask?

Again, after some comments, he said:

And that spirit shows itself in a shape more alarming still in the instrument the Executive has chosen to execute his behests.

So, sir, having read so much by way of excusing my misunderstanding of the Senator's argument, I proceed to reply to it thus: I say the republican party—and I wish the country could hear as much as this—the republican party gave the President no instructions whatever as to what he should do or should not do in New Orleans on the 4th of January, any further than those instructions are to be gathered from the laws of the land. Secondly, General Sheridan was not in command at New Orleans at the time these transactions took place. He assumed command after they were all concluded. Thirdly, General Sheridan did not order anybody to take any one whatever out of the Legislature of Louisiana. Whatever was done in that behalf was done without any direction from him. And, lastly, I have to say that if I am not more mistaken about the events of the 4th of January last than I ever was about any public event, no member of the Legislature was taken out of that State-house on the 4th of January by anybody.

As to that second charge, which I understood the Senator to argue with his usual force and ingenuity yesterday, that the republican party was encouraging the murder of republicans in one section of this country in order to furnish itself with a pretext for crushing the liberties of the country, I have two things to say: First, that the republican party is not guilty; and, secondly, I do not think any one who prefers such an accusation does full justice either to himself or to the intelligence of the people of this country.

Another remark was dropped——

Mr. SCHURZ. I am sure the Senator does not intend to represent me as saying or as meaning what no human ingenuity can conclude from what I did say. If the Senator will permit me but a single moment, I shall point to the sentence to which undoubtedly the Senator refers. It is this:

The people have begun shrewdly to suspect that when some men pretend they must remain in power to protect the lives of the negroes, the cry about murdered negroes must be raised simply to keep them in power.

From that the Senator concludes that I say the republican party want negroes murdered so that they may remain in power.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, my conclusion was not derived from that sentence alone by any manner of means. I thought it was the scope of the Senator's argument from the time he left his statement of the transactions of the 4th of January; but if I misunderstood the scope of his argument, I am very glad to know his accusation was less offensive than I thought.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not think the Senator can point to any single sentence or to any combination of sentences that is open to that construction.

Mr. HOWE. I hope that is so. I have not read the Senator's speech. I am not desirous that he should occupy that position. I do not want to hear any American Senator or any American statesman occupy that position.

I was about to turn to the Senator from Georgia, whom I do not see in his seat, [Mr. GORDON.] The other day, when he addressed the Senate, I understood him to complain of the exhibition of hate which he witnessed as emanating from this side of the Chamber. He professed himself astonished at that, quite unprepared for it. Mr. President, I should be glad to say to that Senator, if he were within the sound of my voice, that he must have misinterpreted the manifestations he saw on this side of the Chamber. The republican party of this country does not hate any portion of the country. That is impossible. We have sacrificed too much in behalf of all portions of the country. It does not hate any portion of the people of this country. A republican, if he is inbred, inborn, thoroughbred, cannot hate anything that has the stamp of American citizen on it. It is the cardinal, fundamental principle of republicanism that government should hold all citizens in equal regard.

Besides, what in the world have we done or have we said to give to any candid man the idea that the people of any section of this country were hated, and especially that people of the southern portion of this country were hated? All the laws we have made for the South we have made for the North, as far as I know anything about them. We have done as much to upbuild the waste places of the South as we have the green places of the North. We have poured out our treasure as freely to reopen their harbors and to open the channels of southern commerce as we have to open the harbors and to open the channels of commerce in any portion of the country.

The same sweet charity which visited Chicago and Boston when laid waste by fire hurried to the South when her plantations were swept by the unloosed floods of the Mississippi. And surely the Senator from Georgia should not accuse the republican party of hatred toward the South. He himself, if I mistake not, was admitted to a seat in this Chamber only through an act of grace passed through Congress by republican votes.

Certain deeds have been done in the South, certain deeds, unless I am mistaken, are being done in the South which republicans as a class I suppose—it is certainly true of myself as an individual—hate with a loathing that I have no power to express. But we have learned to discriminate between an act and the actor. We can abhor the one and not hate the other.

Mr. President, the second complaint preferred by the Senator from Georgia was that his section of the country was traduced. He complained that it had been said in the course of this debate that murder and all the worst crimes known to our law were openly and habitually perpetrated in that portion of the country. I think he stated the charge in much broader terms than I have heard it made. I have not heard any one say that all in the South were murderers. I have heard it said here, and if I have not said it here I have said it elsewhere, that murder has been employed down there and other species of violence have been employed in some sections of the South for political purposes—to carry elections. That is true, or I am mistaken. If it can be successfully gainsaid here or elsewhere, I shall be glad to know it. I believe the fact to be so. Tell me it is not so and make it manifest to the country, and any one who does that will do the country, and the whole country, a great service.

I am not going over the catalogue of offenses coming within this description, as such a catalogue might be made up from the public prints of the last half dozen years; but I want to call the attention of the Senate, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia, whom I now see in his seat, to one of the stories we have in circulation in our portion of the country. It has been currently reported, and I think it has been generally believed—for myself, I have never heard it denied yet—that some time in September last, an organized and an illegal force called upon certain municipal officers in the parish of Red River, and demanded that they should resign their offices; that after some negotiation the officers agreed to resign, and agreed to leave the parish and the State if they could be furnished with a safe conduct out of the State; that those terms were complied with; that their resignations were accordingly drawn up and deposited in the hands of some of those who demanded them.

Mr. MORTON. What were the charges against them?

Mr. HOWE. The Senator asks me what were the charges. The only charge I ever heard made, the only excuse I ever heard offered for this deed came through an Associated Press dispatch. It was said in that dispatch, as near as I can repeat it, that there were some violent negroes in the parish who had threatened violence, had threatened to exterminate the white people of the parish, and that some of these gentlemen whose offices were demanded had been seen during the day in consultation with some of these negroes.

The terms upon which their resignations were offered were complied with. The resignations were drawn up and signed and placed in the hands of some of those who demanded them. An escort was selected to accompany them out of the State. They started for the adjoining State. They reached the adjoining parish of Bossier, when they were stopped by another party of men, and three of the captives (there being six, all white men) were taken out by the side of the road and shot to death and left to lie there; that the party proceeded somewhat further, when the remaining three were deliberately shot and left to lie there, and were subsequently found there and buried by those living in the vicinity.

Mr. GORDON. I did not hear the Senator as to the locality. Was it in Alabama or in Louisiana?

Mr. HOWE. In Louisiana, in the parish of Red River, as I understand it. I say this is one of the stories which are told in northern communities. I heard it. I believed it. I told it. I have told it often outside of this place. I tell it now in this place. I never have heard it disputed. I would be glad to know if it can be disputed. If it be true, then, that single incident of itself goes a great way to justify the assertion that murder is employed as a political agent.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I am not informed as to the facts in that case. I presume it has been investigated by the committee sent down by the other House of Congress recently. I would like, however, to ask the Senator whether the government of Louisiana, which the Senator claims was the choice of a majority of the people of Louisiana, does not hold the courts, whether the sheriffs, and the judges, and the jurors do not belong to the party, as a rule, in Louisiana to which the Senator belongs; and if that be true, and if that government be supported by a majority of the people of Louisiana, how is it that that majority and those courts, those sheriffs, and those jurors have not, with the United States forces to back them and the United States courts to aid them, brought these men to justice?

Mr. HOWE. Whether they have been brought to justice or not, cannot be considered for a moment in determining whether they were guilty or not. If these murders were committed, and were committed for political reasons, for political purposes, that is one fact. Undoubtedly it was the duty of the tribunals of Louisiana, the government of Louisiana, to punish those offenses, if the government was equal to it; but because the government of Louisiana is weak or contemptible, if you please, I am not quite prepared to admit in the face of the American people that that is of itself a license to murder.

Mr. GORDON. Not at all; but, if the Senator pleases, whether the courts could convict and the executive officers could execute, or not, still the fact remains, if I be correctly informed as to the situation in Louisiana, that the prosecuting officers are there, and these men could have been prosecuted and grand jurors could have found indictments, whether the courts could have tried and convicted or not. Is that true?

Mr. HOWE. I do not quite understand what the Senator said, but I think he undertook to say that the district attorneys could prosecute and grand juries could have indicted whether the government could have maintained the indictment or not.

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, I guess that is so; if they had district attorneys who knew enough to draw an indictment, and if they had grand juries which would agree to condemn murder, I should be rather of the opinion that those things could be done.

Mr. GORDON. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOWE. I beg my friend to remember the point at issue. I do not stop here for one moment to defend the Kellogg government. That is not the issue now. We are considering the question whether such crimes are habitually committed, and I want to know simply the fact whether those murders were committed in that way and for the reason alleged.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will pardon me, I dislike very much to interrupt him, but he has called my attention to the question. The Senator by implication, if not in direct words, charges that these murders were committed. Now, I insist that I am confining myself to the point when I say that if it be true—I do not dispute it; it may be true; I do not know anything about the facts—if it be true, it is a most remarkable state of things that this attorney whom the Senator implies possibly had not the brains or the intelligence or the nerve to draw up a bill of indictment and these grand juries had not the nerve to pass upon them—whether that be true or not the fact still remains that if this district attorney lacks intelligence and nerve, the democratic party certainly is not responsible for that, for that attorney belongs to the party to which the Senator belongs. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the rules of the Senate are enforced in the galleries.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I like that and I like the applause which followed it myself. I ask that nobody will be restrained on my account from applauding anything of that kind. Let me say to the Senator, since he thrusts that point of the case in here, no matter what he thinks of the personal characteristics of Governor Kellogg, no matter what he may think of the efficiency of that administration, I do stand here to say that in my opinion if the democratic party of Louisiana will tell Governor Kellogg they will sustain him in any honest effort to put down murder, no such transaction as took place in Red River Parish will happen again; and I believe if the honorable Senator from Georgia, sustained by half a dozen of his political associates on this floor, will tell the people of the South that they will not tolerate such offenses, such offenses will cease.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from Georgia has told the people that often and over again in his own State. We do not have any murders there, and therefore my attention has not been directed to these crimes.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps I am mistaken as to the extent of the Senator's influence. I will tell you why I think he and his associates could put an end to such crimes. A few years ago you know the country was just as much excited about the crimes of bands not called white-leaguers, but called Ku-Klux. We undertook to pass an act here for the punishment of the crimes committed by those men. We did pass one, and prosecutions were commenced under that act, and I remember two things which come in aid of that act. One was that a distinguished lawyer from a neighboring State, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, was employed to go down to South Carolina to engage in the defense of some of the men prosecuted under that act, and he on that trial declared—I cannot repeat his exact words—he was shocked and astounded at the exhibition which the testimony in that case had developed. I think that did a great deal to inform and educate public opinion in that portion of the country. I remember another thing. I remember when I think seven distinguished citizens of North Carolina addressed a letter to the judge of the circuit court of the United States, telling him that they also were shocked at these enormities and telling him that they would see to it—I give the substance of their language—that those crimes be stopped; they did stop, and I think it is as easy for public opinion to check murder in Louisiana as it was to check the raidings of the Ku-Klux in North Carolina.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I understand the state of facts to be in Grant Parish and in almost every part of Louisiana, that witnesses who might come forward to testify in regard to murder, grand jurors who might be disposed to find indictments for murder, jurors who might be disposed to convict for murder, understand distinctly in advance that if they do any of these things they will be treated precisely as the office-holders of Coushatta were—they will be murdered; and that is the reason no man has been or can be punished in Louisiana for murder.

Mr. GORDON. May I ask the Senator who is his informant?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOWE. I want to extend every possible courtesy to my friend from Georgia as well as to my friend from Indiana——

Mr. GORDON. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. But the capacity of the RECORD is limited and I shall tax it pretty severely myself, I expect, before I sit down, and so I must avoid unnecessary interruptions.

One other transaction. I do not mean to stop with this Red River affair. It has been currently reported in northern communities that a large number of colored men in the State of Mississippi were visiting Vicksburgh, or about to visit Vicksburgh, when they were encountered by a body of armed men and fired upon, and quite a number of them were slain. That story is told up there, and I must say that it is believed. I have never heard that statement denied. I have heard it said, and I think the Senator from Georgia the other day rather intimated that they were bound on an expedition of plunder. O! Mr. President, there is some risk when you undertake to try dead men, and especially to try them in an assembly like this. It is not quite safe to conclude that they were really bound on an expedition of plunder. You can always say that of every man who is killed. You have the option of charging him with the intent to perpetrate any crime that you please, and one is just as probable as another. You remember very well, and all remember on the occasion of that terrible event which transpired, I am glad to know, full three hundred years ago, which history shudders over to-day, the massacre of Saint Bartholomew; to justify those murders it was alleged that the victims had formed the purpose of capturing the king; that they were going to rise on Paris; that they were going to perpetrate one enormity after another. History has come to the conclusion that every one of those pretenses was false, every one of them groundless, and that instead of excusing the crime which was actually committed, these pretenses of justification actually aggravated the crime. If these murders were not committed at Vicksburgh I shall be glad to know that, but until this thing and things like that can be successfully contradicted, it must not be thought surprising that an opinion should prevail at the North that life was not as secure in the South as life ought to be everywhere within the country.

Mr. President, another thing has been said. It has been currently reported all over the North that a band of armed men to the number of ten thousand mustered at New Orleans on the 14th of September, and that there by force, without the slightest authority of law in the world, they overthrew and deposed the executive branch of the government of that State. Now, that is true or it is false. I do not think it will be denied. Lives were taken then in that transaction—quite a number of them. That was an assault upon a government—whatever you may say of its rightfulness it was a government—just as well established in fact as the executive government of New York is to-day or the executive government of Wisconsin. Until these things can be contradicted rational men must expect they will be complained of.

Another grievance of which the Senator from Georgia spoke the other day was that the people of his section were accused of hostility to the negro. He protests against that idea. Well, sir, it is very generally entertained in our section of the country. I should be glad to have that idea removed, if it can be. Is it true or is it not true?

Mr. GORDON. It is not true, if the Senator will allow me that much.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, you have before the Senate and before the country the testimony of one witness upon that great question. But out of the mouths of many witnesses these questions must be determined. Let me read the testimony of another witness. I read the testimony of the Senator who spoke yesterday in this debate, the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri, you may remember, was sent into the South in 1865 to note the condition of public affairs in that quarter. When he returned he made an official report touching all the topics of his inquiry. I could read pages with profit. I want to read a single extract from that report upon this very question. The Senator from Missouri then said:

> A large majority of the southern men with whom I came into contact announced their opinions with so positive an assurance as to produce the impression that their minds were fully made up. In at least nineteen cases of twenty the reply I received to my inquiry about their views on the new system was uniformly this: "You cannot make the negro work without physical compulsion." I heard this hundreds of times, heard it wherever I went, heard it in nearly the same words from so many different persons that at last I came to the conclusion that this is the prevailing sentiment among the southern people. There are exceptions to this rule, but as far as my information extends far from enough to affect the rule. In the accompanying documents you will find an abundance of proof in support of this statement. There is hardly a paper relative to the negro question annexed to this report which does not in some direct or indirect way corroborate it.
> Unfortunately the disorders necessarily growing out of the transition state continually furnished food for argument. I found but few people who were willing to make due allowance for the adverse influence of exceptional circumstances. By a large majority of those I came in contact with, and they mostly belonged to the more intelligent class, every irregularity that occurred was directly charged against the system of free labor. If negroes walked away from the plantations, it was conclusive proof of the incorrigible instability of the negro, and the impracticability of free negro labor. If some individual negroes violated the terms of their contract, it proved unanswerably that no negro had or ever would have a just conception of the binding force of a contract, and that this system of free negro labor was bound to be a failure. If some negroes shirked or did not perform their task with sufficient alacrity, it was produced as irrefutable evidence to show that physical compulsion was actually indispensable to make the negro work. If negroes, idlers, or refugees crawling about the towns applied to the authorities for subsistence, it was quoted as incontestably establishing the point that the negro was too improvident to take care of himself, and must necessarily be consigned to the care of a master. I heard a Georgia planter argue most seriously that one of his negroes had shown himself certainly unfit for freedom because he impudently refused to submit to a whipping.

There is the testimony of the second witness. Unless the Senator from Missouri was mistaken in his observations, here is some circumstantial evidence to prove that the Senator from Georgia is mistaken when he says this charge of hostility against the negroes is not true. But that is not all.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I merely wanted to ask the Senator when that report was written, and about what condition of things and at what time that report treated.

Mr. HOWE. I stated in 1865.

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes; about three months after the surrender of the rebel armies, when the condition of things in the South was such that they had scarcely an organized government, and when all classes of society, by the sudden emancipation of the slaves and the revolution which had swept over the South, were thrown into the greatest possible confusion. That was it.

Mr. HOWE. That was the time, Mr. President, from which I suppose I am authorized to infer that the Senator from Missouri, while he insists that the whites were then unfriendly to the blacks in the South, have since become friendly. If there has been such a change of heart, the burden of proof is upon them to establish the fact. But I am prepared to prove it has not changed. Let us see.

The Senator from Georgia says that churches and school-houses exist all over the South as evidence of the liberality of the white people toward the black population there. Just so far as those churches and those school-houses do exist and have been produced by the liberality of the white population they do evidence a change of feeling, and the more there are of them the stronger that evidence is. But, unless I am mistaken, the law of Georgia itself makes but very slight provision for the education of the colored children of that State.

Mr. GORDON. I dislike exceedingly to interrupt the Senator, but he will permit me to say that he is making very grave charges, and unless he dislikes to be interrupted I would desire the privilege occasionally. If, however, he prefers to go on, I will take occasion in a day or two to answer all these things.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly the Senator will have abundant opportunity, and that will be a little more convenient to me. One year ago I brought into the Senate Chamber the laws of Georgia and read them on the subject of education. I speak now in reference to what I remember to have been the laws of Georgia at that time. But let me adduce another piece of testimony on this very subject of the education of colored children. I read now from a dispatch to the Chicago Tribune of December 18 which was sent from New Orleans:

> The school war was resumed this morning. An immense crowd assembled in front of the lower girls' high school and demanded the exclusion of six colored girls who were overlooked when twenty-odd were ejected from the school on the occasion of the raid two days ago. The crowd of men and boys was so threatening and demonstrative that the teachers dismissed the school. Large crowds assembled also in front of Saint Philip's school, where there are eighty or ninety colored scholars. Most of the colored children had remained at home to-day, apprehending trouble, but such as were present were waited on, and ordered to leave, or there would be trouble. Upon this the colored boys packed up their books and left, and the school was dismissed.

So much for the value of the educational facilities furnished the colored people in the city of New Orleans. I just now remember a very recent transaction of some worth in considering whether there is any truth or any foundation for this general conviction in the North of hostility toward the blacks of the South. You remember a difficulty that occurred on the streets of New Orleans a short time since. I understand that controversy grew out of a recommendation made in one of the city papers that separate cars should be put onto the streets of that city for the use of colored people, and that they should be excluded from the privilege of traveling on the general street cars. I understand Mr. Warmoth undertook to remonstrate against that plan, and that the quarrel which resulted in the death of one of the parties sprang from that controversy and that alone. Mr. President, let me read upon that point another authority. The governor of Mississippi, as you know, has recently convened the Legislature of that State for some purpose which I suppose seemed to him proper. I hold in my hand a Mississippi paper, of the date of December 19. It contains an extract from a paper called the Mercury which I understand to be printed in Lauderdale County. This extract is addressed to the colored people of the State, or more especially to the colored members of the Legislature. It says:

The political affairs of Mississippi have reached a great crisis. Old questions must now give place to new ones of the gravest importance. Laying in the shade all questions is this: Will Governor Ames be sustained in the position he has taken? As it shall be decided we have peace with the negro or conflicts, and the late Vicksburgh affair is the beginning, and probably a meager sample. The solution rests with the negroes. If they sustain Ames in his late action against the gentlemen of Warren County, and in his contemplated warlike measure, they assume an attitude of hostility to the whites that will need no interpreter and no prophet to forecast the consequences. The negro members of the Legislature will have the decision within a few days of the question of a war of races. Colored men of Lauderdale—of East Mississippi—where do you stand? Do you want peace, or to follow Ames to another slaughter? Choose your position and show your hands. If you incline to peace—as we hope you do—you ought to be up and doing. You should consult together and shape an unmistakable voice and make it heard at the capital. Let us hear from you. The whites are for a policy of peace; are you for conflict? If not, then it behooves you to act promptly and quick. The moment is upon you. Give your influence to operate upon the members of your race in the Legislature to scout Ames and his mischievous plots—to drive him from his office and the State. And, white men, there are troublous and perilous times for you just ahead, if Ames can compass it. Prepare! Organize! Come to the mass meeting Saturday. If any colored man wants to come, let him.

Mr. President, I do not know how to interpret utterances from the South; but if in the State of Wisconsin any class of our mixed population were to be told they must drive the governor from the State or die, we should understand it as a slight indication of hostility toward that portion of the population. But let me call your attention to another evidence not merely of hostility on the part of the white population of the South toward the black, but an evidence by which the whole democratic party of the Senate, if not of the country, is included. Last winter we tried to pass, and we did pass through the Senate, a bill to establish the civil rights of the colored people of the country. I think every democratic vote in this Chamber was recorded against that bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the Senator is right in that.

Mr. HOWE. I am corroborated in that statement by the Senator from Delaware; and when he affirms anything I say, I know I am right.

I believe the main objection urged to that particular bill was that it rendered mixed schools possible. But in 1872 we tried to pass a civil-rights bill, and we did pass one through the Senate, which was not open to any such objection; and the democratic party of the Senate was just as unanimous against that bill as they were against the bill of last winter.

Sir, I cannot be mistaken, I think, upon this point. Unless I am very much mistaken the democratic party has no other tie of affiliation than this of hostility to the negro. You just place the negro upon the plane of civil equality and the democratic party would be dissolved to-morrow. You cannot carry that party one rod together outside of that controversy. They are united whenever the interests of the colored people are concerned, and I do not know when or where they have been united upon anything else.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one moment? The Senator says that the democratic party is united only upon one principle, and that is hostility to the negro. Now, sir, with all due deference to the gentleman, I happen to reside in a State that has a very considerable negro population, and I say to him, and say it in the presence of this Senate, that, so far from being hostile to and enemies of the negro, I believe, from my observation with reference to the action of democrats and with reference to the action of republicans towards negroes, that we are the true friends of the negro; and while we do not seek and are not willing to put ourselves upon terms of social equality with the negro, this unwillingness emanates from no spirit of hostility to the colored people, but from that high regard to ourselves which I am sorry to see does not distinguish some of my friends upon the other side of the house.

Mr. HOWE. I hope my distinguished friend from Delaware did not mean to be severe by that concluding remark. Hostility to the colored people he denies. They are the true friends of the colored people—that he affirms. I expect my friends to help me when I need help; but if they will not help, I have a right to demand of my friends, that they let me help myself. And when I see the democratic party willing to let this colored population, upon whom the white race has stood for centuries—when I see a disposition anywhere to get off them, to let them stand up, and to let them do the best they can for themselves, then I will forego this charge of hostility. I have not seen that yet.

Mr. President, is it an evidence of friendship for the negro that there was not a democrat scarcely to be found in the United States who would consent, by his vote, to let him be free? Is it an evidence of friendship for the colored man that there was not a democrat in the United States who would consent to give him the ballot? Is it an evidence of friendship toward the colored man that there has not been seen a democrat in this Chamber who would agree to allow him to ride on cars that other men ride on; allow him to go to theaters when he pays for a ticket; allow him to be entertained in the hotels when they pay their fare? Are these conclusive evidence of friendship toward the colored race? I do not understand them so.

Social equality, says the Senator from Delaware, they disclaim and refuse. Were they ever asked to submit to social equality? Did republicans ever attempt to legislate on the subject of social equality? Does the government of a State, or the Government of the United States, possess any sort of control over the subject of social equality? My social relations have always been, and so far as I know yet remain, subject to my own exclusive control, even in defiance of the Army of the United States. We have never attempted to legislate upon that subject, and my friend from Delaware will allow me to say that I do not think he is quite candid when he pretends that the right to travel on a steamboat or to sleep in a hotel involves the right to enter any private house or to visit any private family.

Why, sir, I was saying that you could not carry the democratic party in a body upon any other measure. You remember what took place in this Hall only a year ago. We forgot this controversy about the negro; we undertook to settle a question of finance, and we saw the democratic party split almost in the middle; and for that matter the republican party was split very much in the same way. You saw leading democrats and leading republicans conferring together last winter almost through the whole session. I remember distinctly how delightedly I used to hang upon the lips of my friend from Delaware who sits nearest to me [Mr. BAYARD] when he was expounding the gospel of hard money here. I began to warm up toward him; I began to hug myself with the assurance that there was really something very good that had come out of Delaware. So you saw the Senator from Illinois, who now sits before me, [Mr. LOGAN,] in very cordial and intimate conferences with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] The two Carolinas lay down together, and party lines seemed utterly broken up. And to-day, Mr. President, if it were really and thoroughly agreed that the negro could have in every part of this country just an equal chance to help himself, without disabilities laid upon him either by law or by society, neither the democratic party nor the republican party, in my judgment, could hold together three months; you would be forced to contend about some other public measure; and it seems to me very certain a measure upon which neither the whole republican party nor the whole democratic party could agree.

Now, Mr. President, I have some comments to make upon the speech of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I regretted that speech. I thought that speech did great injustice to the President of the United States, to the republican party, to General Sheridan, to the Senate, and I think it did injustice to the Senator himself. His first attack was upon General Sheridan—not first in order of time, but the first that I propose to allude to. Now, who is General Sheridan? He is Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States. If he has any political party predilections I do not know the fact; I never heard it stated. The country believes that General Sheridan has earned the high commission he now holds. General Sheridan was in New Orleans on the 4th of January. From that point he sent a telegram to the Secretary of War that has often been read and often been commented upon. Speaking of that telegram, the Senator from Delaware said:

I confess to you as I read this dispatch my blood curdled in my veins. If it had been sent in the midst of strife by a man heated by the excitement of combat, there might have been palliation for it, because a cooling time would have come when his better reason would operate, when "Philip sober" would have answered this "Philip drunk." But this dispatch was penned in safety; it was penned in quiet; it was penned where there was nothing threatened him, and without anything to cause him excitement except the apprehended loss of political power to the chief whom he was sent there to represent.

What character does this officer seek to assume? There was Tristan l'Hermite, the provost-marshal of the royal household, whom the genius of Scott has painted until he is familiar in every household. If seems to me that this officer has modeled himself much upon the morals and conduct of this hangman of royalty of days gone by.

That is the language employed in the Senate of the United States of the Lieutenant-General of the Army. What was the offense the Lieutenant-General had committed? He had spoken of murders being committed repeatedly, habitually in one portion of the country. He had characterized those murderers as a banditti. He had suggested remedies for those terrible disorders which would unquestionably be illegal if they were adopted. He suggested for a most extraordinary state of things an extraordinary and illegal remedy. He was too indignant, as the Senator may think, at a system of atrocity which if it was denounced in too vigorous terms by General Sheridan never was denounced in too vigorous terms by anybody else. That is the only offense the general had committed. I did think that the Senator from Delaware, instead of exerting his ingenuity, his great intellectual resources in heaping up denunciation on the head of Sheridan, ought to have spent a little of that intellectual force in condemnation of the crimes upon which Sheridan was commenting. When murder is endemic I think the soldier who suggests the wrong remedy is much less guilty than the Senator who denies all remedy.

But the Senator says that General Sheridan's dispatch has been rebuked by the country and was rebuked by the clergy of that section, and he introduces into his speech a telegram signed by several clergymen of the State of Louisiana. All I have to say about that dispatch is, that if those clergymen did not understand better what was the condition of things in Louisiana than they seem to have understood what Sheridan had said of it, they were not competent to testify in the case. They represent General Sheridan as having "addressed a communication to the Secretary of War, in which he represents the people of Louisiana at large as breathing vengeance to all lawful authority and approving of murder and crime." General Sheridan made no such allegation as that. He did state that there was in that State a "defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life, which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large." Whoever denies that statement, whether clergyman or layman, will hazard his reputation for veracity.

Mr. BAYARD. Read further the same dispatch.

Mr. HOWE. "The lives of citizens"—he continues—"have become so jeopardized, that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden." If you have not become convinced of that already, Mr. President, you will soon hear startling evidence of its fidelity to truth.

Mr. BAYARD rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BAYARD. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to let me say a word?

Mr. HOWE. I will yield for a suggestion.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish merely to read the remainder of this dispatch—to continue the paragraph where the honorable Senator stopped—to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest."

Defiance—

Said this Lieutenant-General—

If that be not the arraignment of the community as being entirely favorable to the commission of murder, it would be difficult to find language to do it. I do not wish to be represented as meaning to be personally offensive in what I have said of General Sheridan. Personally, I may say, I have scarce an acquaintance with him; and in what I said I sought to do him no injustice or detract from what I believe to be his just credit as a soldier. But it seems to me incredible that a Senator so advanced in years, in learning, and in experience, and so personally amiable as the Senator from Wisconsin, could stand here to find fault with me for the very restrained reprobation which I expressed the other day in regard to the ferocity of this dispatch of a soldier of the United States, addressed against a community over whom he holds the powers of martial law. I do think the honorable Senator will find outside of this Chamber, and perhaps outside of his political affiliations that surround him, but one sentiment of the civilized world on the subject of that dispatch of Sheridan's. He strove to drive outside of the pale of that law which is his protection to-day, and which is by right the protection of every American citizen, whole classes of men who were lawfully organized, whose objects were public, whose objects were just as lawful as the objects of the National Guard of the State of New York, and he did propose to submit them to drum-head court-martial or perhaps hang them without. I looked upon his dispatch as a cry for the blood of a people whom he should have protected, and whom certainly he should not have denounced in what I must believe to be an utterly false and unjustifiable manner.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I utterly deny that the language of General Sheridan proposed to outlaw any but assassins. He did not outlaw anybody. General Sheridan has not stepped one inch over the line of the law in anything that he has done.

Mr. BAYARD. Did he not ask the President of the United States to issue a proclamation that he has no more right to issue than he has to issue a bull in the name of the Pope—to issue a proclamation declaring certain classes as banditti, and then shut his eyes and he will attend to them?

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, General Sheridan did not ask the President of the United States to do that thing. The general did suggest that perhaps a proclamation might issue which would give him the power to restore that community to peace and to order. That General Sheridan was entirely mistaken in that suggestion I have no sort of doubt. General Sheridan stood there in the presence of murder. He felt keenly. He spoke strongly. He suggested a remedy which the law would not warrant; but I do not regard that as an evidence of human ferocity. That is not ferocity which seeks to arrest murder by unlawful means. That seems more like ferocity which refuses to arrest it by any means.

I would rather see all men too sensitive than too insensible in the presence of such crimes as have rioted in Louisiana. Show me when General Sheridan has perpetrated an inhuman deed, show me when he has made a recommendation which tended to inhumanity, show me when he has asked for power to visit penalties upon the innocent, show me when he has recommended penalties that were to be visited upon any but the guilty, and then if I do not unite with the Senator from Delaware in his denunciation of the general, I will not stand here to make a single criticism upon any denunciation that he may see fit to visit upon his head.

Sir, what was done in New Orleans on the 4th of January? Let us turn our attention from what was said, and consider for a moment what was done. This is the way the Senator from Delaware tells that story:

There was an organization of that house. There was a speaker elected and placed in his chair. There was a clerk also chosen; and this was done in the presence of a quorum of the house of representatives constitutionally convened, and by the votes of a constitutional majority of those present, quietly, regularly, and peacefully cast.

Again he said:

The house of representatives of Louisiana was on the 4th of this present month purged of five members who were in their official seats, quietly and peaceably filling their places in that body, having been admitted and sworn into office by the only competent body to admit them or pass upon their qualifications.

I take issue with the whole of that statement. I say that the house was not organized; I say there was no speaker elected and placed in the chair; I say there was no clerk elected; I say there was not a single member taken out of that house. Five persons were taken out of the house of representatives of Louisiana, as I understand it. The Senator from Delaware concludes that they were members of that house. I insist they were not. Who made them members? The laws of Louisiana created just one class of tribunals to select members of the Legislature, to wit, the several representative districts in the State. The first requisite, therefore, to a seat in the house of representatives is that somebody should obtain a majority of the legal votes in his representative district. The next requisite is that his election shall be ascertained by a tribunal appointed by the laws of Louisiana, and called the board of returns.

Elections were held in districts for five different members. It is said that the five gentlemen who were taken out of the assembly received a majority of the votes cast at that election. If the fact was so, it ought to have been so certified by the board of returns. The board of returns, however, did not so certify. And without such certificates of election they had no more right to take seats in the house of representatives of Louisiana than I have or than you have, sir, until admitted by the vote of the house itself, after due organization.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question of fact? As I understand, the house of representatives of Louisiana was organized with the exclusion of the five persons of whom he speaks. The names which were called by Mr. Vigers, the clerk of the former house, did not include these five persons. But one hundred and one members answered to their names; and then those persons proceeded to organize, and a ballot was taken upon the organization showing 59 votes, in which Mr. Hahn and five other republicans joined, he being the opposing nominee for speaker against Speaker Wiltz. The admission of the five was after a speaker had been selected by a duly-organized quorum of the house, and a clerk elected by the same means, and a sergeant-at-arms elected by the same means. Then a committee of that house reported as to the five petitioning members, claimants to seats, whose certificates had been refused by the returning board, but against whom there had been no adjudication by the returning board. They came to the only authority on the face of the earth known to law to pass upon their rights to seats, and that was the house, which, by the constitution of Louisiana, was the sole judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members; and that house so organized, with these republican members in it, voted to seat these five men who were subsequently removed by military force.

The Senator will see the point. They did not go in by certificate of the returning board, but they did go in by report of a committee of the body which was the sole judge, and the proper constitutional judge, of their qualifications and right to seats; and after they had been as legally admitted according to the forms of law as the honorable Senator or myself have been admitted to our seats in this Chamber, then the military came in, and placing their hands upon the shoulders of these unarmed men, drove them from that chamber by military force. Such I believe to be the facts of this case.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, we are talking here without official information. My understanding is directly the reverse of that stated by the Senator from Delaware. I do understand that there was not in that Legislature a quorum of the house of representatives who did vote to elect a speaker or who would have voted for the election of Mr. Wiltz as speaker, unless you count as a part of that quorum these very gentlemen whose right to seats there had not been certified.

Mr. BAYARD. They were not part of that quorum and were not counted as part of it, nor did they assist in or take any part in the organization of that house.

Mr. HOWE. General Sheridan says, which comes the nearest to being official information of anything we have had upon the point, that—

At twelve o'clock William Vigers, the clerk of the last house of representatives, proceeded to call the roll, as according to law he was empowered to do. One hundred and two legally-returned members answered to their names; of this number fifty-two were republicans and fifty were democrats.

Stopping right there, this was a dispute between two political parties, I take it. It seems a little difficult to understand how fifty democrats could have chosen a speaker and a clerk over the heads of fifty-two republicans. The way in which that was done is explained by General Sheridan, as follows:

Vigers had not yet finished announcing the result when one of the members, Mr. Billican, of Lafourche, nominated Mr. L. Wiltz as temporary speaker. Vigers promptly declared the motion out of order at that time, when some one put the question, and amid the cheers of the democratic side of the house Mr. Wiltz dashed onto the platform, pushed aside Mr. Vigers, seized the speaker's chair and gavel, and declared himself speaker. A protest against this arbitrary and unlawful proceeding was promptly made by the members of the majority, but Wiltz paid no attention to those protests, and, upon a motion from some one on the democratic side of the house, declared one Trezevant nominated and elected clerk of the house.

Fifty-two republicans and fifty democrats were present. It is difficult to see how fifty democrats could outvote fifty-two republicans. The only way a minority can control a majority is by force and not by votes. Republicans, it is true, might have voted with democrats if they chose to do so. But no one asserts that a single republican did to vote. The only man who could lawfully put a question to that assembly was the clerk, Vigers. He was the only authority to declare the result. He did not declare that result. Wiltz himself declared his own election. He was not waited upon to the chair. He "rushed" to it. The gavel was not surrendered to him. He seized it. The clerk did not abdicate. He was deposed. Fifty members drowned the voices of fifty-two; and that could only be done by counting the voices of those who were not members. If that can be done, if a legislative body can be organized in that way, any half dozen members may come into the House of Representatives at the opening of the next session of Congress, bringing the requisite number of those who have not been elected to constitute a House of Representatives, go into joint convention, declare themselves severally elected, choose a speaker, and organize the House of Representatives of the United States. Nobody could put a question to that house but Mr. Vigers until a speaker was elected. Over the question of that election Vigers alone could preside. When under his presidency the house had divided and a quorum was found to be there, and any one man was found to have a majority of that quorum, then that man was authorized to take the chair, and the duties of Mr. Vigers as clerk of the house ended. That I do not understand ever took place in that body.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware not only charges the specific fact that five members of the House were taken out, but he bases upon that allegation the charge that there is prevailing through the ranks of the republican party a conspiracy against republican government itself. He says:

> But the issue now to be raised between the people of the United States and those whom they have elected as their rulers is whether this Union of States shall be governed by law or by mere personal will of the official; whether we shall have a civil government or a military dictatorship; whether we shall have a free government or a despotism. The issue is, if I mistake not, not less grave than this.

Again he says:

> I believe it is never wise to blink the truth. I believe it is never wise in governing a people in any way to deceive them, or to rule them by false promises. And here I state to the Senate and the country that I believe these governments "so called" in the Southern States are but thin veils for actual military power in the hands of the Federal Administration.

There is a bold attempt to persuade the Senate and to persuade the people that this Administration and the republican party are unfriendly to the Constitution of our country and to our form of Government; unfriendly and hostile to the principles of civil liberty. Now, does the Senator from Delaware really believe that there is a man in this Chamber, especially on the republican side of it, who would consent to the slightest infraction of our Constitution, much less consent to the overturning of both Constitution and laws; or that there is anybody in this Chamber of republican tendencies who would consent to see a despotism substituted for the form of Government we enjoy? Does he expect the American people to believe any such statement? And can he believe it himself?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I can scarcely suppose the Senator asks me the question gravely whether I believe there is a republican Senator in this Chamber who is disposed to make any infraction of the Constitution of the United States. I have seen too many by law after law passed, so that there is scarcely a feature of the Constitution left that it seems to me the majority have respected. I am not now impeaching the motives of any man; I am not saying that he sees the consequence of his acts. When the Senator asks me a question like that, I can scarcely believe he asks me in earnest. What I said in the speech two years ago that the Senator has read from I believe as I believe my own existence, and it is my sorrow to believe it.

Mr. HOWE. If we want to substitute a despotism for a constitutional government, it is not worth while to talk about motive. If we are for it, we want it. If we mean it, that is what we are aiming at; there is no question of motive. We are foresworn if that is our attitude. The Senator says that we have trampled upon the Constitution until there is scarcely a vestige of it left. That may be his opinion. That is not mine. It happens, fortunately for the people of the United States, that neither his opinions nor mine upon these questions control. What is the security of the people for all their rights against him, against me, against you, against the President, against the Army? It is the presence of a judicial forum where every personal right may be tried and may be determined. "Judge Durell," interjects the Senator from Delaware, and I thank him for the interjection. Judge Durell is not a judge any longer. We have had a great many judges in this country, some good and some bad. Some have regarded judicial forms and some have disregarded judicial forms. Judge Durell no longer holds any judicial position. While he did hold one he may have disregarded the forms of procedure; he may have disregarded the behests of law; but Judge Durell could not be fatal to the rights of any individual, much less to the rights of the people of the United States. Suppose he did take jurisdiction of a cause of which he had no jurisdiction; or suppose, having jurisdiction, he decided contrary to law. Whatever he did was the subject of revision, was the subject of review. But then he was not the only judge we have had in the United States. We have some great, we have some wise judges. Who has attempted to interfere with their judicature? There they are. If any law has been passed by the Congress of the United States which transcended the Constitution, that did not weaken the Constitution; the Constitution annulled the law; but it happens before you can disregard the law you are required not to consult the Senator from Delaware, not to consult me, not to consult the caucus of a party; you are to bring the validity of the law to the consideration of the judicial courts and take their judgment upon the point. I know very well the courts may hold a law to be constitutional which is unconstitutional, and the Senator from Delaware and myself, in spite of the judgment in a given case, may entertain our personal convictions in reference to it, but it would hardly do for him or myself to act in contravention of that determination after it was once pronounced.

Mr. President, I stand here to say that if it could be made to appear that a military force had taken five members of the Legislature out of the State-house, or taken one member of the Legislature out, that act would not be approved by General Sheridan; it would not be approved by the President of the United States; I do not believe it would be approved by a single republican Senator on this floor; I know it would not be approved by myself. But if he had taken five or fifty members out of the Legislature, I do not admit for a moment that the foundations of civil liberty would have been weakened: I do not admit for a moment that the government of Louisiana would have been overthrown. It was an illegal act undoubtedly, whether taken out by a soldier or taken by any other extraneous force; but what would happen? Taking a representative out of the State-house does not deprive him of his official character. I imagine if any illegal force should take me out of the Senate Chamber I should not cease to be a Senator of the United States. I should cease to be here, I take it; I should not be able to return here as long as I was held in custody; but if I was taken out of here by a major-general, even by a brigade of the Army, the writ of habeas corpus would take me out of their custody; and when I was out of their custody I would return here and I take it the Senate would receive me into my seat and I would still be a Senator. If a detachment of the Army did take five members out of that Legislature without the consent of the Legislature, there the Legislature remained behind them. There is no pretense that they were held in custody five minutes after they went out of the door. When they were released from that custody, why did they not return to the Legislature? There was the Legislature of which they were a part waiting for them—a quorum and a majority of a quorum waiting for them. Why did they not go back and take their seats? The truth is, I suspect, Mr. President, that there was not a Legislature there waiting for them. There was a faction of a Legislature, the rump of a Legislature, needing just so many votes to constitute a quorum.

But if it is the purpose of the Administration to employ military authority to override the popular will, why is it not attempted elsewhere? Elections are held not only in Louisiana, but in every State of the Union, elections just as free as they ever were, and just as conclusive of results as they ever were. We have been told that at the elections which transpired in November last State after State wheeled from the republican line into the democratic line. Too many States in my judgment did that. Did the military interpose to prevent it? Was power exerted anywhere or in any direction to prevent this? Is there any sort of justification, any sort of excuse for asserting that whatever was done in New Orleans last Monday was a willful disregard either of the laws of that State or of the laws of the United States? You may charge the President of the United States with being the murderer of Nathan, and the whole republican party with being accessory before the fact. You may as easily maintain the charge as to maintain that there was any willful disregard of law in New Orleans on Monday last by the authorities of the United States.

Mr. President, if the opposition in this Chamber shall succeed in persuading the country that the republican party is dangerous to its liberties, the people will, as they ought, dismiss that party from the administration of the Government. Then a democratic President will ever more resume command of the Army and Navy. It is long since a democrat has been Commander-in-Chief.

The country may have forgotten on what services the Army was then employed. I want to call attention to some of the employments furnished the Army in those old and happy days.

You may remember that in 1854 quite a detachment of the Army was employed in the city of Boston, not called for by the governor of Massachusetts, but sent there by the Federal Government. Not only was a detachment of the United States marines employed, but a portion of the militia of Massachusetts was employed. Major Ridgely's artillery battalion was part of the detachment; one platoon of marines was next in the order of the procession; the marshal's civil posse was next; two platoons of marines were next; Lieutenant Couch's field-piece was next; another platoon of marines brought up the rear. The district attorney was instructed by the President "to incur any expense deemed necessary by the marshal and yourself for military or otherwise to insure the execution of the law." What was the enterprise in the execution of which that great military force was employed? It was to take one negro out of the city of Boston.

One other chore engaged the attention of a portion of the Army in 1859. Virginia was invaded that year by a force, if I remember aright, consisting of eighteen white men and five negroes under the command of one John Brown. I believe Virginia did not call for Federal intervention, for Federal assistance. Virginia mustered there, to repel that invasion, with her own troops; but the Federal Government volunteered just as promptly. The courts found that the design of the expedition was to do several things—to commit murder, to run away slaves, and to overturn the government of Virginia. That was judicially determined. These would seem to be offenses which Virginia should resist if she was capable of it, and if she was not capable she should do what Governor Kellogg it seems did, call for Federal assistance. Virginia did not call for that assistance, but it was volunteered.

The Army slaughtered all but five of Brown's followers. Virginia hung four of that five. Liberty survived all such exploits. If liberty could endure to see the Army employed as slave-catchers in Massachusetts and slave-drivers in Virginia, I am persuaded it will not perish, although it has been used to repel a riotous and lawless assault upon the Legislature of Louisiana.

Under democratic command the Army was victorious over Anthony Burns, and it made a bloody resistance to the raid of John Brown. But when confronted by a rebellion organized in the interests of slavery, the Army suddenly became innocuous and helpless.

Under republican command the Army crushed that monstrous rebellion, and since that rebellion was disarmed the Army has patrolled the States as it has always done in time of peace.

Wherever it has been it has proved the safeguard of all but criminals. It has caused no citizen to bleed, but in many neighborhoods of the South it has been the only styptic which could stay the effusion of innocent blood.

Mr. President, I wish these political controversies could assume a milder form. I do not like to see the country forced to divide between two great parties, one of which is denounced as dangerous to civil liberty and the other as fatal to human life. But I cannot afford to smirch my soul with the guilt of murder to prove that my heart is true to liberty.

There is one way of ending this whole controversy. If republicans and democrats will once cordially agree that all citizens, whether white or black, shall equally enjoy the protection of all governments, whether republican or democratic, the controversy will be ended, and democrats and republicans will cease to abuse each other and will begin to consult together to promote the good of both.

We are threatened that the people are alarmed. I see some evidence of it. We are threatened that they are preparing to overthrow the administration of that party which has conducted the Government from 1861 down to this time. That may come. I do not profess to be insensible or blind or deaf to these threats. The Senator from Missouri yesterday admonished us in very earnest terms if we would escape these perils to "turn back." Sir, no man is more anxious to escape peril than I am myself, but I cannot consent to "turn back" in order to avoid it. I am not constructed upon the craw-fish plan. My way must be on. The Senator from Missouri may be wise to turn back. It may be well for others to turn back. I cannot. I am going on, so far as I understand myself, precisely in the track pointed out by the Declaration of Independence. Let me see, once, the rights, the plain, natural rights of all citizens asserted by law and respected by all, then I shall be prepared, if not to turn back, at least to turn to something else. Until that time comes, I shall have to press forward as well as I can. I would like to have a favoring tide to float me on; but, if the tide really ebbs, I would rather paddle a little than go back. There may be storms ahead. It may be prudent for all who are not well-insured to go ashore. Of course every one has perfect leave. The moment he crosses the gangplank, he can commence to fire on the ship. I beg only they will postpone that fire until they have crossed the plank. While they still remain a part of the crew, I do not like to have them try to scuttle the boat; for, as I said before, I am going to try to complete the voyage. If the ship goes down before the voyage is completed, I propose to go down with it, either on deck or in the hold, as the people of Wisconsin shall direct; and if the ship should ever be raised again, as raised again it most indubitably will be—I do not know when, I do not know at what cost, I know it will be raised; the great Underwriter will raise it—the ship will be raised, and when raised you will find floating at its peak the flag under which I have served for twenty years, the flag on which will still be read the irreversible decree, that all men, whatever their race or their color, are of right free, and have an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would ask the Senator from Illinois if it is his purpose to go on this evening? I notice that the day is somewhat spent.

Mr. LOGAN. It being so late, I would prefer to wait, or let some other business be transacted that I may speak after the morning hour to-morrow. Still, I am subject, of course, to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] wishes to occupy the floor. Would it be the pleasure of the Senator from Illinois to yield to allow him to go on this afternoon?

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection if I can have the floor in the morning, if that would be satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. TIPTON. In case I should not finish my remarks this evening, I would desire to finish them in the morning.

Mr. LOGAN. But I wish to advance what arguments I have to make in the morning.

Mr. TIPTON. I am easily satisfied. I will waive any remarks I wish to make until after the Senator from Illinois shall have concluded.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In that view I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment while the Chair clears his table?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Attorney-General, communicating, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, information in relation to the massacre at Trenton, Tennessee; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3911) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2419) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes.

The amendments were to strike out all after the word "Government," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Four condemned iron cannon and sixteen cannon-balls to each of the following-named organizations, for the purpose of ornamenting the burial grounds of deceased soldiers:

To the city of Massillon, Ohio;

To Post No. 139, Grand Army of the Republic, at Somerville, Massachusetts.

The amendments were concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REDUCTION OF POSTAL EXPENSES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be directed to inquire if any change can be made in the postal laws to reduce the expenses of the Post-Office Department without impairing its efficiency as an agency of the people for communicating intelligence and disseminating information, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORCORAN SQUARE MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4303) to incorporate the Corcoran Square Market Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

DESERT LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4304) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill to repeal the clause requiring proof of loyalty in the pension act of February 14, 1871.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does this bill come from the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It has passed that committee several times.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill repeals so much of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, as excludes persons from the benefits of said act for disloyalty to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not oppose this bill; but I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia whether it would not be best to include in the bill one or two other modifications of the law on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the bill was fully understood. I ask that it be again read.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that bill; but——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object to it.

Mr. SENER. A bill of the same nature has already passed this House and is now pending in the Senate. Therefore all we can do about the matter is practically accomplished.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I give notice that I will present the bill next Monday under a suspension of the rules.

ACCIDENTAL DESTRUCTION OF TREASURY NOTES, ETC.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to communicate to this House the circumstances attending the destruction of a large amount of Treasury notes and national-bank notes in the late accident on the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad near Benning's Station.

ISSUE OF GOLD NOTES BY BANKS.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Banking and Currency, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the bill is read I wish to state that it is one local in its operation, having relation only to the banks issuing notes payable in gold. There are no such banks in existence except on the Pacific coast, and the gentlemen representing that section of the country desire that the bill shall be passed at this time.

The bill was read. It provides that so much of section 5185 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as limits the circulation of banking associations, organized for the purpose of issuing notes payable in gold, severally to $1,000,000, be repealed; and that each of such existing banking associations may increase its circulating notes, and new banking associations may be organized, in accordance with existing law, without respect to such limitation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is the unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition is that the banks which undertake to pay their notes in specie shall be without any limitation whatever.

Mr. MERRIAM. It is free banking so far as the gold banks are concerned.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, sir, I shall call a division of the question on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, there were—ayes 59, noes 7; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that such a bill as this should not pass without the vote of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before tellers are ordered I ask permission to say a single word. This is a Senate bill proposing to remove the restriction which the present law fixes upon the issues of national banks issuing gold notes. Under the law as it now stands such banks are not permitted to issue bills beyond the amount of $1,000,000. This bill proposes to remove that restriction. It is applicable locally to the Pacific coast, where these gold banks are located; and its passage is desired by gentlemen who represent that part of the country. The Committee on Banking and Currency were not divided in their view of the policy of adopting the measure and allowing the banks that pay their notes in gold to issue as many of them as they may secure under the provisions of the law regulating the issues of this class of banks.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been assumed, at least by the legislation that has been adopted up to this time, that the specie basis will be reached in progress of time; that ultimately all the banks will carry on their business upon the basis of gold—will redeem their notes in gold. The only effect of this bill is of course simply to extend the national-banking system. That is to say, both those banks that pay coin and those which may redeem their currency in lawful money are to be permitted to carry on their business without any limitation whatever as to the amount of their capital stock or the amount of their issues.

The only objection I have to the bill is simply this: I am opposed to the national banking system; I am opposed to that form of currency. I believe that the whole people of the country should have the benefit of the currency that may be issued and circulated as money. This only presents in another form the question between the currency of the United States—the notes of the Government, which are lawful money—and the issues of the national banks. I object to the bill, because I am opposed to a system of currency the benefit of which is to accrue to a body of capitalists instead of a currency which, being issued in the form of Government notes—lawful money, accrues to the advantage of the whole people. It is on that account I have called attention to this question. I am in favor of greenbacks as the currency of the country, so that the benefit of it may reach the entire people, instead of the large profits arising from paper money inuring to a comparatively small portion of the people in the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did not the gentleman vote for the banking law passed the other day?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I did not.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Indiana has given us his views on the national banking system, but the question of the banking system at large, to which the gentleman refers, is only very remotely connected with the subject of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is the same now as then. The only trouble then was my friend from Tennessee thought proper to cut off all debate and all amendment. That bill was forced through this House by the simple power of the majority without any consideration. No bill of a corresponding importance ever passed this House, it seems to me, at least without some opportunity for consideration.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest the House has had the benefit of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana at great length. They listened with great satisfaction and interest to him in presenting his peculiar views, and as they were presented more ably and forcibly and with more elucidation of manner than they have been presented by any other one, the majority thought, at least so far as discussion and speeches are concerned, they had heard all that could be said on the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill certainly passed without any consideration of the subject or opportunity for amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if there is any precedent in the legislation of Congress or of any State for permitting any class of corporations whatever to contract debts without limitation, and whether that is not the result of this bill?

Mr. MERRIAM. If there is any absolute security in the hands of a bank-note holder it exists in the holder of national-bank notes redeemable in gold, as is the case of the holder of these gold bank notes which are secured by the pledge of United States bonds which are above par in the gold markets of the world.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the bill be read again.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not the bill allow a certain class of corporations to contract debts without any limitation whatever?

Mr. MAYNARD. Let the bill be again read.

Mr. HOOPER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee what the condition of these banks will be when we resume specie payments in 1879—whether the notes of these banks will not then be entirely the same as the notes of any other national banks?

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose when all the national banks pay their notes in gold then they will all be gold banks.

Mr. HOOPER. But why should we not extend the same privilege to all of the national banks by repealing the portion of the law that limits their circulation to a percentage of their capital?

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill leaves the gold banks subject to that limitation the same as all other national banks. The limitation repealed by this bill is only the one providing that no gold banks shall have more than one million of circulation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether this bill has any reference but to gold banks?

Mr. MAYNARD. Only to gold banks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me make an inquiry. I believe I was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency when the bill passed in 1870 by which banking was made free for these gold banks with no other limitation than that no bank should have a circulation of over $1,000,000. I understand this is to remove that limitation from these gold banks, and to say that the banks now established under that clause may take a larger amount or that new banks hereafter to be established under that law may have any amount they choose to issue under the law, but of course they are restricted by depositing their bonds and will have only a certain per cent. just as now. So that it holds them to the restrictions which the banking laws now hold them to, except the single one that they may have more than a million dollars. Am I right?

Mr. MAYNARD. That is it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, allusion has been made to the bill recently passed this House on which debate was denied. For one I think if debate and amendments had been permitted we should have been able, some of us, to show serious and vital objections to that bill. We had to content ourselves without any such opportunity, for we were told in a measure that bill was the wisdom of the republican party in so far as they could present a financial solution of the question now agitating the country. Therefore the responsibility for the effects of that bill upon the public credit and the public industries of the country rests entirely with the dominant party. There was I know a formidable intellectual minority on that side of men mostly who have studied the subject, as I notice by reading the names. But I want, now that the opportunity is presented, to direct attention to two of the features of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me it is hardly in order on this bill, but I will not interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. In the first place, the first and second sections of that bill directly involve an expenditure on the part of the Government of $44,000,000 in the purchase of silver to supply the place of the fractional currency now in circulation. In the second place, we sought some of us to amend that bill. And let me say here, before leaving this question, it will involve three years of time to mint the silver necessary to substitute that amount of fractional currency. And then we desired at the same time to amend that bill so that the question should be forever settled, by providing that no Secretary of the Treasury should ever have the power in himself to reissue any greenback, so as to have the opportunity at any moment to inflate or contract the money market.

Now, these are two features which the republican party alone in this House is responsible for; and not only is it responsible for the operation of those two sections, but, sir, it denied us the opportunity on this floor of presenting them in an intelligent manner to an intelligent people.

Mr. GARFIELD. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I desire to say a word.

I wish to say, in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I do not understand that in any proper sense of the word the bill which passed a few days ago in reference to specie payments involved the payment from the Treasury of $40,000,000, except in the way of redeeming our outstanding paper fractional currency.

Mr. RANDALL. It increased the national debt just that amount, and it provided further for increasing it by making it interest bearing instead of non-interest bearing.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not increase the national debt.

Mr. RANDALL. It increases the interest-bearing debt.

Mr. GARFIELD. It may increase the interest, but it is of the very essence of any measure to resume specie payments, that we shall pay our non-interest-bearing debt by redeeming it on presentation. Nobody can confront the idea of specie payments without coming to the conclusion that we must increase the payment of interest by taking up the non-interest-bearing paper and putting it in the form of interest-bearing paper.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Could not the same object be accomplished by retiring the national-bank paper instead of retiring the greenbacks?

Mr. GARFIELD. I admit, as a matter of course, if we could turn all our public debt in all its forms into Treasury notes we should, apparently at least, save paying interest. But the policy of the country has been too long settled against the issuing of vast volumes of paper by the Government—in other words, making the Government a banker—for that question to be raised now as a practicable one. I should regard it a sad day for this country financially when the Treasury, too, becomes a banker and issues the paper that is to be used as currency.

But I will not enter upon that discussion. I want to say for myself, and I know for many others who concur with me, that I voted for the specie-resumption bill on two grounds: In the first place, I voted for it because of what was not in it. That may seem to be a slender ground for voting for the bill; but hitherto my fear has been that any bill likely to be passed by this Congress would be a bill of inflation, a bill to increase the volume of our paper money and drive us further from specie payments; and when I found a bill that was likely to get the consent of both Houses of Congress that distinctively excluded that idea——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. What idea?

Mr. GARFIELD. The idea of inflating the paper currency of the country. When I found that the bill virtually excluded that idea, it was in my judgment a real gain, for it amounts to an abandonment of inflation. In the second place I voted for the bill for this affirmative reason, that it was a solemn declaration of law for the first time proposed, or at least for the first time passed, that we would at a fixed time in the future resume specie payments. That declaration is clear and unequivocal. A day is fixed, and the law declares that that day shall witness that consummation. Now, that was something—something of a gain in the direction of specie payments, a gain which I was not willing to lose.

Mr. MERRIAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at present. Now, the machinery by which that bill proposes to lead us to that consummation does not seem at all adequate to bring about the result; but my hope is that public opinion, following the lead of this solemn declaration for specie payments, will enable Congress before that time arrives to take the necessary steps to achieve what has been solemnly promised. And that was the reason, and the controlling affirmative reason, why I for one voted for that bill.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. KELLOGG rose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall have to resume the floor and demand the previous question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment to offer an amendment; at least to have it read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will yield to have it read, but do not yield to have it offered.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to have the amendment read, and I hope the gentleman, in order to relieve himself of the charge made the other day in regard to shutting off amendments, will allow it to be offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:

Provided, That all legal-tender notes retired under the provisions of the law passed at this session shall be canceled and destroyed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will let us have a vote on that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not yield to the gentleman to offer that amendment. As far as relieving me is concerned, the remark of the gentleman was uncalled for.

Mr. KELLOGG. I only want to relieve the gentleman from the imputation cast on him for not allowing amendments to be offered by getting a vote now and testing the sense of the House on this amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not ask to be relieved.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, if the gentleman insists on the previous question, I hope the House will vote it down, and let us see if we cannot get an amendment to the bill which ought to be made.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope it will be voted down.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the previous question; and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. KELLOGG were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the yeas and nays upon that question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that we may as well take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; the sense of the House can be as well tested on this motion as on the other.

Mr. RANDALL. If you do not order the main question, the bill may be so amended as to be acceptable to the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 80, not voting 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Clayton, Clements, Coburn, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Hagans, Hamilton, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Wilson—73.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS—CHARLES ABERT.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a motion of a privileged character. Mr. Charles Abert having answered the questions he was directed by the House to answer, and such other questions as were put to him by the Committee on Ways and Means, I move that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ELKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4305) to grant the right of way to the Colorado and New Mexico Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to call up from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill. I desire to call up those amendments for the purpose of having them concurred in, and not for the purpose of sending them to a committee of conference. The Senate has increased the amount appropriated by the bill only $20,000—a thing unprecedented in the history of any appropriation bill. The amount of increase being so small, I am free to say that I do not want to go into a conference upon the bill, for I do not think we can get out in as good condition as we are in now.

Mr. RANDALL. The conference committee could not alter any portion of the bill except that amended by the Senate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is true; but it might recommend an increase of the amounts in those items.

No objection being made, the House proceeded as in Committee of the Whole to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 3819, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; and the same were severally read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DABNEY H. MAURY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed at this time Senate bill No. 743, to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury. The petition in the case is in the Senate, where the bill originated.

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES M. FAUNTLEROY.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed at this time Senate bill No. 744, to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia. The petition in that case is in the Senate.

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed, two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now renew my call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past one o'clock, and the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Military Affairs, where the call rested during the last morning hour for public bills.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments Senate bill No. 924, donating condemned cannon to the city of Masillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, three condemned cannon to the city of Masillon, Ohio, for the purpose of erecting a bronze statue on the soldier's monument in that city.

The amendment was to strike out from and including "three condemned cannon" to the end of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Four condemned iron cannon and sixteen cannon-balls each to the following-named organizations, for the purpose of ornamenting the burial grounds of deceased soldiers: City of Masillon, Ohio, and Post No. 139, Grand Army of the Republic, at Somerville, Massachusetts.

Mr. DONNAN. The amendment recommended by the committee is in the nature of declining to furnish bronze cannon as material for statues, and simply gives what Congress has been accustomed to give for some years past, four condemned pieces of iron cannon and some cannon-balls for that purpose. It also adds to the bill one place in Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ROADS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2419) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona.

The bill appropriates the sum of $30,000, to be used, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the construction of military roads in the Territory of Arizona, as follows, namely: From Fort Whipple to Camp McDowell, with a branch to Camp Verde; from Fort Whipple to Skull Valley direct; and for such work as is needed upon the road from old Camp Goodwin to Camp Apache.

The amendment was to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. DONNAN. This Territory has been organized twelve years, and has never received one dollar from the General Government in this direction. General Crooke, in command of that department, strongly recommends this appropriation on the ground of economy: in fact he recommends the appropriation of a much larger sum. And the Secretary of War reports that it would be strict economy on the part of the Government to make this appropriation for this purpose. The accomplishment of this object will in a single instance shorten the distance of transportation sixteen to eighteen miles, and will save at least 50 per cent. in the expense of Government freighting between those points.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2013) providing for the payment of officers commissioned by governors of the States and afterward mustered into the service of the United States during the time between the date of the commission and the mustering into the service of the United States; which was laid on the table.

PAY OF OFFICERS MUSTERED OUT BUT REAPPOINTED.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870.

The amendment was read. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert a provision that thereafter, when any person who was mustered out as a supernumerary officer of the Army with one year's pay and allowances in addition to the pay and allowances due him at the date of his discharge under the provisions of the "act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, shall be reappointed by the President as an officer of the Army, such appointment shall be under and with the express condition that 50 per cent. of such officer's pay shall be stopped monthly until the sum total of the extra year's pay and allowances received by him when mustered out shall have been refunded to the United States.

Mr. GUNCKEL. When the bill was passed reducing the Army to thirty thousand men, it was provided that any officer voluntarily mustered out under that bill should receive one year's extra pay and allowances. A large number of officers took advantage of this provision and were thus mustered out. Subsequently the President reappointed some of these men as officers of the Army. The Secretary of War assumed to deduct from their pay the amount of the extra year's pay and allowances; but on an appeal to the Attorney-General he decided that this could not be done. This bill proposes to provide as to the future, that if any officers so mustered out with one year's pay and allowances should be reappointed, they shall submit to a deduction of one year's pay and allowances.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the word "hereafter" where it first occurs.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I cannot yield for that amendment. I am instructed by the committee to recommend the passage of the substitute as it stands. We do not assume to make this legislation retroactive, because it has been decided by the Attorney-General (and I have no doubt properly) that this cannot be done. We simply adopt a provision with reference to the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Attorney-General, as I understand, decided, when this subject was referred to him, that these officers reappointed were entitled to retain their extra pay. The Secretary of War, however, took a different view. More recently, as I understand, the purpose of this bill has been accomplished as to payments hereafter to be made. The officers thus reappointed are now receiving their pay without any drawback, on account of the fact of their having resigned under the bill to reduce the Army. This bill will really accomplish nothing unless it conforms to the opinion delivered by the Attorney-General. For the purpose of carrying out what is manifest by the law, which has not been carried out in consequence only of the conflict of the action of the Secretary of War with the law, I trust the gentleman will consent that the word "hereafter" be struck out.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The Secretary of War has been deducting this pay in the case of officers reappointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not up to this time.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The Attorney-General has decided that that cannot be done. We do not undertake to interfere with that legal question, but simply to provide for the future that if any of these men shall be reappointed this deduction shall be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask the gentleman this question: If an officer of the Government has placed his construction upon the law with reference to the payment of officers of the Army, is it not fair that the officer on the one hand should be compelled to go into the courts for the purpose of determining his rights, and that the Government upon the other part should incur the expense of such litigation? Is it not well enough to assume that if this question were to go into the courts the views of the law officers of the Government will after all be adopted as the law of the case? Ought it to be assumed that the Federal courts in a case between these officers and the Government will be in conflict with the view the Government has expressed by its law officer. I submit that a question of this kind is eminently proper to be made the subject of litigation.

Mr. GUNCKEL. That being a question of law which should properly be examined by some other committee, we did not assume to pass upon it. We simply propose by this bill to relieve future cases from any doubt in reference to this question.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNCKEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 378) for the relief of enlisted men who served for thirty days in the war against the Seminole Indians in the State of Florida; and the same was laid upon the table.

THOMAS HASLEM.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4060) for the relief of Thomas Haslem, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

CORRECTION OF AN ARMY OFFICER'S RECORD.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3942) authorizing the Secretary of War to correct an Army officer's record, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

WALLACE MOTT.

Mr. GUNCKEL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4306) for the relief of Wallace Mott; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, ordered to be printed.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4159) to reduce and fix the Pay Department of the Army, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides in its first section that the Pay Department of the Army shall thereafter consist of one Paymaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general, two assistant paymasters-general with the rank of colonel, two deputy paymasters-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, thirty paymasters with the rank of major, and twenty paymasters with the rank of captain, with pay and emoluments of officers of said grades.

The second section provides that no appointments shall be made to the grade of major until the number of officers of that grade be reduced below thirty, and thereafter the number of officers of that grade shall not exceed thirty; nor shall this act be construed to allow more than fifty paymasters of both grades at one and the same time; provided that no officer now in service shall be reduced in rank or mustered out by reason of any provisions of law therein made.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In the first section strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty," and strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen;" so it will read:

Twenty paymasters with the rank of major, and fifteen paymasters with the rank of captain, with pay and emoluments of officers of said grades.

And insert "fifteen paymasters with the rank of first lieutenant."

In the second section strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty," and strike out "both" and insert "all;" so it will read:

SEC. 2. That no appointments shall be made to the grade of major until the number of officers of that grade be reduced below twenty, and thereafter the number of officers of that grade shall not exceed twenty; nor shall this act be construed to allow more than fifty paymasters of all grades at one and the same time: Provided, That no officer now in service shall be reduced in rank or mustered out by reason of any provisions of law herein made.

Mr. DONNAN. I move the following substitute:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Pay Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Paymaster-General with the rank of colonel, two assistant paymasters-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, twenty paymasters with the rank of major, fifteen paymasters with the rank of captain, and fifteen paymasters with the rank of first-lieutenant, with pay and emoluments of officers of said grades.

SEC. 2. That no appointments shall be made to the grade of major until the number of officers of that grade be reduced below thirty, and thereafter the number of officers of that grade shall not exceed thirty; nor shall this act be construed to allow more than fifty paymasters of all three grades at one and the same time: Provided, That no officer now in service shall be reduced in rank or mustered out by reason of any provisions of law herein made.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I make the point of order that bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

LAWRENCE A. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4307) to place Lawrence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, on the retired list of the Army; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to place on the list of retired officers of the Army the name of Lawrence A. Williams, late major of the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, with the rank of major; provided he shall be entitled to pay as such major only from date of the passage of the act.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. This bill puts upon the retired list of the Army an officer dismissed without any explanation whatever. I ask to have read a letter from the Adjutant-General to show that the record of the officer is perfectly clear. This officer is now lying in Baltimore seriously ill, and he probably will not survive more than a month. The simple object is to have the disgrace removed from his name for the benefit of his children.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 30, 1871.

SIR: Referring to your verbal request a few days since, in regard to the records reporting your absence without leave, you are respectfully informed that the regimental returns of the Sixth United States Cavalry so report you from December to March, 1863; but they have been corrected, as the period embraced is covered by medical certificates filed by you during the said period in this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Major LAWRENCE WILLIAMS,
Late United States Army, Commandant Headquarters Department of the East, New York City.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Is it too late to raise the point of order on that bill?

The SPEAKER. It has been discussed, and the point of order comes too late.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORPHANS OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. HUNTON, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4308) for the protection of orphans, widows, and heirs at law of officers of the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that when any number of officers of the United States Army, not less than two hundred and fifty, shall signify to the Secretary of War their desire to unite for mutual survivorship annuity protection, and shall be deemed eligible thereto by the Secretary of War, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to make through the Pay Department of the Army equitable deductions, determined as provided in section 2 of the act, from the monthly pay of said officers, and to deposit the same to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, to be passed into the general balance of the United States Treasury, and be known as the Army mutual survivorship annuity fund.

The second section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to adopt as soon after the passage of the act as practicable a set of survivorship annuity tables, based upon suitable life tables, to regulate the deductions to be made from the monthly pay of such officers of the Army as may be accepted by the Secretary of War under the act, to secure to each one of said officers the survivorship annuity which he may elect to purchase for a nominee to be designated by him.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to have such examinations made of officers applying for purchase of annuities under the act as he may deem necessary, to issue such certificates of purchase, and to prescribe such rules and forms, not inconsistent with the act, as may be needful to govern the applications of officers for said annuities and to secure prompt and proper responses to said applications.

The fourth section provides that the purchase of a survivorship annuity under the act shall take effect from the date that the application therefor shall receive the approval of the Secretary of War, and the annuity shall be due to the nominee from the date of the death of the purchaser.

The fifth section provides that nothing in the act shall be construed as limiting the number of annuites which may be purchased by the same person; and in case the purchaser of any annuity under the act shall elect to terminate the monthly deductions from his pay required by the act on account of such purchase, he shall be entitled to receive, in lieu of a certificate for a full annuity, a paid-up certificate for an annuity in equitable proportion to the amount of deductions which shall have been made from his pay on account of said purchase, the payment of which annuity to his nominee shall commence at the death of said purchaser.

The sixth section provides that estimates for so much of the Army mutual survivorship annuity fund as may from time to time be required to pay annuities falling due under the provisions of the act shall be made and transmitted to Congress in the same manner as estimates for the pay of the Army; provided that no interest shall be allowed on the deductions so covered into the Treasury; and provided also that no appropriation shall be made to pay annuities falling due under the act beyond the amount of said deductions, and that no expense or liability on the part of the United States shall in any case be incurred under the provision of the act.

The seventh section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to submit to Congress annually a full statement of the Army mutual survivorship annuity fund, and he is thereby authorized to adopt such rules and forms as may from time to time be found necessary to carry out the purpose of this act; provided that no compensation, fee, or allowance shall be allowed to any officer for services rendered under the act.

The eighth section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to have the annuities falling due under the act paid by the Pay Department of the Army in the same manner that officers of the Army are paid; and all laws and regulations fixing the accountability for public funds shall apply to the moneys of the Army mutual survivorship annuity fund.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It seems to me that that bill is open to the point of order that it involves the expenditure of money; inasmuch as it involves the receipts of certain money by the Government from certain sources and a holding of them for disposition afterwards by being paid out in a certain way. I think it is a bill which ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole. It is certainly a bill that ought to be printed and laid upon our desks before we consider it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER in the chair.) Under the new rule this bill is unquestionably liable to the point of order that it makes an appropriation of money. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. The bill does not require a dollar of appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Reappropriation of money brings a bill under the new rule.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the Committtee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4309) to extend the observations of the Signal Service of the Army so as to benefit the public health; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to provide for such extension of the Signal Service of the Army as will permit such observations as may be necessary with a view to the public health to be taken at the different stations throughout the United States, and appropriates for that purpose the annual sum of $5,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that the bill appropriates money, and should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the objection, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole.

WILLIAM MOORE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 810) for the relief of William Moore, late a private in Company A, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers; and the same was laid on the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Military Affairs have no further business to report aside from what is in the hands of the chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] and the House has assigned a full hour for their reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore then called in consecutive order the Committee on the Militia, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Public Expenditures, the Committee on Private Land Claims, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs; no reports being made by any of those committees.

The call having reached the Committee on the Territories,

Mr. CESSNA said: The Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. Speaker, has a number of reports to present.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary was called in its order and no reports were presented. Other committees have since been called, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects to going back.

Mr. PACKARD. I ask unanimous consent that the call may return to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I was engaged when that committee was called. I have a number of reports to present from it.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to going back.

Mr. PACKARD. I ask unanimous consent to go back to that committee. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not object to that.

Mr. RANDALL. If we were to allow the call to go back in one instance we should have to permit it in another.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have a very large number of bills to report, and they ought to have an opportunity of presenting them.

Mr. RANDALL. They ought to have been on the alert when they were called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee was very distinctly called.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Chair waited for two minutes before passing to the next committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair made an ample pause in calling the several committees.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to say that I did not hear the call.

Mr. RANDALL. The quicker we go on the quicker we will get around. I object to returning.

The Chair then called the next committee on the list, the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. PACKARD. Is objection made to going back to the Committee on Private Land Claims?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to object.

Mr. PACKARD. I entirely failed to hear the call.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not fail to hear it. I heard it very distinctly.

Mr. PACKARD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is much nearer the Chair than I am. I am on the outskirts of the Hall, and it is entirely an accident that the call was not heard. There are some bills which we desire very much to present, and I hope there will be no objection to going back.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman must see that if I object to returning to the Committee on the Judiciary I must object to returning to the other committees.

Mr. PACKARD. I have been looking for the call, but I was sitting so far from the Chair that it entirely escaped me.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to an opportunity being given to the Judiciary Committee to bring in a bill repealing the law of last winter providing for the bringing of persons from other parts of the country to the District of Columbia for trial?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not to be catechised in that way. I object, when the call has passed a committee, to our going back to it. I am not altogether satisfied with the general run of the business of the Judiciary Committee, and am willing therefore to avail myself of this advantage.

The SPEAKER, (having resumed the chair.) The Chair does not desire to lecture the House, but he wishes to say that in no session has he ever witnessed such utter carelessness in regard to the call of committees on the part of their chairmen as in this session. It is the duty of a committee to know when it is on call.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say that I was assured by some members of the Military Committee that they would occupy the whole hour, and that it was not necessary that the Committee on the Judiciary should be ready. But for fear there might be some time left, I had brought down some two or three reports which I was prepared to make. I happened at the moment to be reading a report, and did not hear the gentleman who was then occupying the chair calling our committee.

Mr. RANDALL. If I must be called upon to state what is the fact, I must say that I think my objection is really a little beyond a matter of etiquette as regards the Committee on the Judiciary. If I could deal with this as a matter of etiquette solely, I would of course yield. But there are matters of legislation to which I am not willing as one of the members of this House to give any advantage. Some of those emanate from that committee, and therefore I object to the call going back.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have been unable in consequence of the confusion to hear what the trouble is.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is this: The Committee on Military Affairs having finished their business, there were called in consecutive order by the gentleman then occupying the chair at the request of the Speaker, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] the Committee on the Militia, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Public Expenditures, the Committee on Private Land Claims, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and when the Committee on the Territories was reached there seems to have arisen a little alarm in regard to the subject, which was, as usual in the House, rather late. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects, these committees having been regularly called and failing to respond with business, to going back in the call. It requires unanimous consent to go back, as the call must go forward, it being within the competency of the House by a suspension of the rules on Monday next to restore these committees to the position they have lost.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Perhaps the Chair can avoid the difficulty by calling through the remaining committees.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think perhaps the Speaker may get around through the docket.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will proceed with the call.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust there will be no objection to going back to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. O, yes; I object.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will give a reason.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would ask whether, inasmuch as no report has been made from the Committee on the Territories, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was the last committee called before it, may not present reports? A gentleman was speaking to me at the moment the committee was called and I did not notice it.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has been passed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It was the last one called; the call rested there and no reports have been made from any other committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Committee on the Territories had been called.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; it had.

The SPEAKER then proceeded with the call of committees.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. MONROE. I am instructed by the Committee on Education and Labor to report a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. Is the resolution authorized by the committee, or does it proceed from the gentleman himself?

Mr. MONROE. I understand it was authorized by the committee, although their names are not signed to it.

The SPEAKER. Then it is in order.

The resolution was read, and referred under the law to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there shall be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education, five thousand for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Education and Labor any further reports to make?

Mr. MONROE. I have only one more item.

Mr. RANDALL. You are entitled to one hour.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MONROE. I do not wish to occupy it. The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred at the last session of Congress the duty of investigating the condition of the agricultural colleges of the United States, have prepared a report on that subject, accompanied by a resolution of inquiry, and I now propose to submit it and ask that the report be recommitted and printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask to have the report read.

Mr. MONROE. It will take a long time; it is not necessary.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. MONROE. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the time of the House, as I understand the desire to be to go on with the call, so as to come around to the committees which were accidentally passed, and with that understanding, with a view to accommodate the House, I withdraw my report.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. EAMES. I ask, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Patents, that the same courtesy shall be extended to him that was extended to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, as, like that gentleman, he has been absent at Vicksburgh by order of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Was there any courtesy shown the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Patents will not have lost its place.

Mr. EAMES. There is only one bill perfected by that committee of a general nature, which is in charge of the chairman of the committee, who is absent by order of the House. I hope the same indulgence will be extended to him that has been extended to others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island will observe that the Committee on Patents transacts most of its business on private bill days, and is therefore called oftener than other committees.

Mr. EAMES. I am aware of that; but this is a bill of a public nature, and I only ask the same courtesy that has been extended to other committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks that the chairman of the Committee on Patents, who is absent by order of the House, be authorized to report a bill at some other time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees. And when the Select Committee on the Washington National Monument was called,

Mr. CHIPMAN said: I am instructed by the committee to report a bill providing for the completion of the Washington National Monument.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do not report it now.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not see why that subject should be deferred.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; go on.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman a report to make?

Mr. CHIPMAN. The report has been made and is printed; it is report No. 485.

The SPEAKER. That report has already been made; it does not involve any action of the House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have a bill to present which I am instructed by the committee to report to the House and ask its action upon at this time.

The SPEAKER. Where is the bill?

Mr. CHIPMAN. It is a printed bill on the files of the House; House bill No. 3021.

The SPEAKER. On this call the Chair is not waiting for bills to be looked up.

Mr. CHIPMAN. If it is the desire of the House to proceed with this call rapidly, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The next committee on call is the Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That will not change the position of things at all, the next committee having been called.

Mr. LAMAR. I made the motion to adjourn before any response was made.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have a copy of the bill here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. CHIPMAN. It is House bill No. 3249, to provide for the completion of the Washington National Monument.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to a point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been read. It will be read, at least enough of it to indicate whether it is subject to a point of order.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read so far as the portion which proposes to appropriate $325,000 for the completion of the Washington National Monument.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I raise the point of order that this bill, containing an appropriation, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. Reports are next in order from the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. LAMAR. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. And on that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. G. F. HOAR and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 31, noes 83.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being on a division ayes 32, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 159, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Wilson, and Wood—71.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) authorizing Thomas W. Fitch, engineer of the United States Navy, to accept of a wedding present sent to his wife, Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On Tuesday of last week a special order was made, authorizing the Committee on Public Lands to present for the consideration of the House to-day sundry bills granting right of way to railroads across the public lands. The Committee on Public Lands have been very conservative in regard to the disposition of the public lands recommended by them.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The House gave to the Committee on the Public Lands the right of presenting their reports, as indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] for consideration to-day to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Is not my motion in order?

Mr. RANDALL. I think the House is bound to consider these bills to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the order of the House includes appropriation bills as well as other business. The Committee on the Public Lands was given this day only for the consideration of its bills, to the exclusion of all other business whatever.

Mr. GARFIELD. The RECORD will show that I rose and asked that the appropriation bills might be excepted from this order, but I think that the Chair remarked that it was too late, which I regretted.

The SPEAKER. That is the fact.

RIGHT OF WAY TO RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I was about to remark that the Committee on the Public Lands have been very conservative with regard to the appropriation of public lands to railroads. A few years ago such grants of land were given with a very large degree of liberality until the people put the mark of their disapprobation upon them. In the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses the Committee on the Public Lands reported no bills granting lands to railroads beyond the right of way, and no grants of public lands of any other character except on account of timber culture—a few lots that may have been abandoned as military reservations and some lots that had been overflowed by the tide. Beyond that the committee have reported no kind of land grants. They have endeavored to preserve the public lands for the benefit of actual settlers. They have reported a bill which has already passed this House—an amendment to the homestead law—which, when it shall have passed the other branch of Congress, will be of most beneficial tendency, enabling every individual in the country to get a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land upon merely paying the fees of the land officers and complying with the requirement of five years' settlement. All our grants of public lands, therefore, have been narrowed down to rights of way.

The committee have instructed me to report back the bill (S. No. 379) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the latter being identical with the bill (H. R. No. 2459) granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States. This is a general bill; it contains but few provisions, yet it is supposed to meet all the requirements of the railroads that may be incorporated in the States and Territories and whose roads may run through the public domain. It is a bill which will save to this House a large amount of special and local legislation; for if it should not pass, (and I trust that it will pass,) there will be behind it from a dozen to twenty bills granting the right of way to local railroads, which would require for their consideration a large amount of the attention of the House.

Before the substitute is read I will say that, as will be observed, the Senate bill provides for the incorporation of railroad companies in addition to giving them the right of way through the public lands; the substitute provides for the right of way alone.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, except the District of Columbia or by the Congress of the United States, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of said road; also the right to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station-buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turnouts, and water-stations, not to exceed in amount twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road.

SEC. 2. That any railroad company whose right of way, or whose track or road-bed upon such right of way, passes through any cañon, pass, or defile, shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupancy of the said cañon, pass, or defile, for the purposes of its road, in common with the road first located, or the crossing of other railroads at grade. And the location of such right of way through any cañon, pass, or defile shall not cause the disuse of any wagon-road or other public highway now located therein, nor prevent the location through the same of any such wagon-road or highway, where such road or highway may be necessary for the public accommodation; and where any change in the location of such wagon-road is necessary to permit the passage of such railroad through any cañon, pass, or defile, said railroad company shall, before entering upon the ground occupied by such wagon-road, cause the same to be reconstructed at its own expense in the most favorable location and in as perfect a manner as the original road: Provided, That such expenses shall be equitably divided between any number of railroad companies occupying and using the same cañon, pass, or defile.

SEC. 3. That any railroad company desiring to secure the benefits of this act shall, within twelve months after the location of any section of twenty miles of its road, if the same be upon surveyed lands, and if upon unsurveyed lands, within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a profile of its road; and upon approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office; and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way: Provided, That if any section of said road shall not be completed within five years after the location of said section, the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to any such uncompleted section of said road.

SEC. 4. That this act shall not apply to any lands within the limits of any Indian reservation, without special authority of Congress, unless such right of way shall be provided for by treaty stipulation or by act of Congress heretofore passed.

SEC. 5. That Congress hereby reserves the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act or any part thereof.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] regard the language of the fourth section as sufficient to exempt all lands that ought to be exempted from the operation of the bill—for example, military reservations, reservations for public parks, &c.? Perhaps I can make my meaning plainer to the gentleman by stating that in my judgment the section should read—

That this act shall not apply to any lands within the limits of any military, park, or Indian reservation, or other lands specially reserved from sale without special authority of Congress, &c.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This provision could not apply to any of those lands without the authority of Congress.

Mr. KASSON. My theory is that this bill will give such authority from the fact that it only excepts Indian reservations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is not a legal conclusion.

Mr. KASSON. If the bill in its general terms includes all public lands and specifically excepts one class only—Indian reservations—I think the conclusion is inevitable that it would give the right to cross a military reservation. If there is no objection, I move, in order to exclude the doubt, to amend the section so as to read in the form I have just stated.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Why not strike out the word "Indian," and thus except all reservations?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

The SPEAKER. That amendment will be considered as adopted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to hear the amendment read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as this bill was subject to a point of order, and inasmuch as that point has not been insisted on, I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not deny the opportunity for reasonable amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The amendment I desire to offer is to strike out in the first section this clause:

Also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not admit that amendment.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. In a little while. The bills which have heretofore passed the House, with one single exception, have all included that clause. The committee thought that it was not an unfair nor an excessive allowance one of these railroads should have the privilege of taking material, stone, and timber from the lands adjacent to the line of the road. It is but a small pittance given to them, and if they are willing to risk their capital out in the Territories, they ought to have some little show in order to enable them to build these roads.

Mr. STORM. I have always understood there has been serious objections to these special grants to railroad corporations to include a grant of material, stone, and timber to be taken from lands adjacent to the line of the road. I would ask my colleague whether it has been successful in any other than in the single case to which he has alluded? I hope, therefore, in this general bill there will be no such provision included granting the use of material, stone, and timber to be taken from lands adjacent to the lines of these railroads. I see no more reason why men building roads in the Western Territories shall have the right to go upon the adjacent lands for material, stone, and timber than in any of the States.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I notice, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of opposition to the continuation of the land-grant system to any of the new Territories, and that objection now comes especially from those gentlemen whose States have been developed under the operation of previous grants of public lands. But, sir, whatever other objection there may be to this bill, I did not think for one moment any man in this House would make opposition when we in the Territories, through the expenditure of our own means, by our own energy, and with our own capital, undertake to construct lines of railroad through rocky cañons and over sterile wastes—I say that I did not suppose any gentleman here would object to allowing us to take rocks and valueless land adjacent to those lines of roads any more than if these roads were to go through the air which blows over those rocks and plains. The lands where these lines are to run are as worthless without these railroads as if they were in the center of Africa or in the midst of the desert of Sahara. The building of these roads is the only thing which can or will give them any value.

When our people spend twenty, thirty, or forty thousand dollars to build a mile of railroad, instead of asking enormous subsidies like those granted in the past, we only ask the poor pittance, as it seems to me, our people shall be allowed to use the material, stone, and timber which they may find upon the lands adjacent to the proposed lines of road.

Mr. STORM. We have always heard just such eloquent words whenever a land grant is under consideration in this House. It is the same old story.

Mr. MAGINNIS. We are not asking for a land grant.

Mr. STORM. When there is a proposition to build a railroad in the center of Africa or across the Desert of Sahara the gentleman's argument will be pertinent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I decline to admit the amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands if, in his judgment, it is not desirable to make some provision in this bill for the manner in which private lands and possessory claims on the public lands of the United States may be condemned to the extent and for the purpose indicated? The bill which I had the honor to introduce last winter, and which had the approval of the committee of territorial Delegates, had such a provision, and others which I respectfully submit might well have been accepted by the Committee on the Public Lands; but it is so important to the people of the Territories that they be enabled to acquire the right of way for their railroads without coming to Congress in every instance, that for one I am not disposed to be critical, although I should like an answer to the inquiry I have made.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The laws of the Territory are to provide for ascertaining the damages incurred by anybody through whose land these railroads may pass.

Mr. NEGLEY. That may be in some of the Territories, but in the Territory of Utah the operation of the Poland bill has been to remove the probate court, and I understand it is impossible to obtain such condemnation. I wish to offer an amendment in that regard.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It may be done in the United States district court.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am willing to admit an amendment in regard to the condemnation of lands, such as was provided for in the Union Pacific Railroad bill which was passed in 1864.

Mr. NEGLEY. That is just what I proposed to offer, and if the gentleman will permit me I will send the amendment up to be read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, whether his bill will preserve the just authority of the States after they are admitted into this Union? If Congress shall grant these rights of way to extend across the continent, across Territories which are to grow into great and populous States with cities and towns, it is essential that some public authority should exist and it should I think be the authority of the State when it comes into the Union to direct changes of location, changes of construction, and in respect to the crossing of bridges and highways and all the other details necessary for the preservation of the rights of the people. It seems to me the bill should contain, and perhaps it does contain, a reservation of the lawful authority in the State just as if the charter for the construction of the roads had been granted by the State itself.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he has any doubt about the power of the State to control the subject after it should be admitted?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that if the right of way were granted over public land the title to which belongs to the United States and is vested in the United States, so that the title consists in the ownership by the United States of the soil, and the use of it by the corporation, it is very doubtful whether the State has authority, if disposed, to require changes in the rates.

Mr. SHANKS. I desire the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I desire to say that the committee thought that those rights were sufficiently guarded and sufficiently enlarged. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to submit an amendment which will probably cover the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso at the end of section 2:

Provided, however, That any State hereafter formed within the limits of which a railroad the right of way for which shall be obtained under the provisions of this act or any part thereof shall be situated shall have full authority at all times to regulate and limit the charges for the transportation of persons and freight over the same, so far as situated within its limits, and to prevent discrimination in transportation.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman from Indiana understand that Congress has any power to delegate to States the right to control interstate commerce?

Mr. HOLMAN. My answer to the gentleman is that Congress has power to attach conditions to the grant it makes of the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. SMALL. I understand that Congress has no power to delegate to the States the right to control commerce between the States.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not a delegation of power but a condition on which the grant is made. Congress grants the railroad corporation this right on the condition that it shall have power to legislate over the subject-matter; and the corporation accepts the grant on that condition. I think there can be no objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not this something in the nature of the condition on which several States lately in rebellion came back into the Union; there being a clause that certain things should not be changed in their constitutions, that certain rights of the colored race, for instance, should not be interfered with in any way? That was a limitation if they accepted it, when they came in, and it is binding in all future time upon them.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the same way, if the railroad corporations accept this grant, they do it with this condition.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say a word upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] That amendment does not at all meet the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is that Congress shall delegate to any future State that may be brought into the Union, from any Territory over which a railroad accepting this grant shall run, the power to regulate the commerce over that railroad.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is nothing of the kind in my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think if the gentleman will read it again carefully he will find that it is in it. I take it that the rule is this: that Congress, in granting the right of way over the public domain to a corporation, does not and cannot limit the powers which the State itself may exercise when the Territory through which such road runs shall be admitted into the Union as a State. I do not think it is in the power of Congress to do that, because when the State is admitted into the Union, it is admitted into the Union with all the rights of all the other States—no more and no less. Therefore Congress cannot bind a future State in that regard.

The gentleman from Indiana proposes an amendment to this bill by which he declares as the sense of Congress that the right to regulate interstate commerce shall be given to any future State that may be created out of the Territory through which the railroad runs. Now, in the first place, Congress has no power to do it; and if it had the power I should object to it. I object to Congress yielding any of its powers or rights to control interstate commerce. Well, suppose Congress says nothing upon that subject and the Territory through which any of these proposed roads run is admitted into the Union of States, what will be their powers in regard to commerce transported over these roads? They will be the same as those exercised by any State in this Union over any road within its limits. Congress can exercise control over rates for freight or passengers passing from one State to another, but any such State so admitted would control absolutely all the commerce passing from one point to another within the limits of any such State that might be created. Congress, therefore, cannot add to or take from the powers to be exercised by the State, and I object to Congress declaring now in an act of this kind, anywhere or in any way, that it parts with the power it has over interstate commerce. Let the matter remain as it is under the Constitution of the United States. Let any of those future States that may be admitted exercise the same powers as Illinois, Pennsylvania, or any of the other States exercise, but let there be no attempt here to add to or take from their powers.

That is the objection I make to the amendment. And I desire to say one word further in reference to the objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] who sits near me. He thinks there ought to be something incorporated into this bill that shall negative any purpose to take from any future State this power. Why, Congress has no power to do it. It has no power to take from the rights which may be exercised by the future State as to any road passing within its limits. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to state that he deemed it important to amend the bill so that these rights should be saved.

Now, it seems to me that question is not properly involved at all in this bill, and that nothing can be added to the bill which can affect it. You may try it, but it will be ineffectual.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will not do any harm.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It will; because it is a declaration by Congress that it will, if it has such power, part with the right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And further, the last section of the bill reserves the right of Congress to alter or amend it in any manner it may choose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] to hear me a moment in explanation of my point. Suppose after a railroad company has built a railroad under this bill in a Territory a State is formed there, through whose territory the road passes. Now, what would be the condition of the road-bed? It is a tract of land owned by the United States, over which a railroad under the authority of the United States passes. Now, if the State undertakes to meddle with that location, it is meddling with lands within its limits the property of the United States, and with a right of way within its limits granted by the United States. The United States may in the course of years or generations have parted with all its public lands in the State or in the vicinity of the road, and still, whenever the State undertakes to exercise the ordinary local authority of permitting a highway across the track of the road, or a bridge to be built over it, or requiring the railroad in a populous city to move its track from a street in the central part of the city to the outskirts, or any other of those acts which State authorities exercise, the railroad will meet the State with the constitutional objection that this land you are dealing with is the property of the United States; the eminent domain did not come from your State to us as in ordinary cases, and the right of way with which we are clothed was given by the United States. In that case the people of the State would either have to come to Congress for a remedy or be without it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is not that the condition in which the Union Pacific Railroad stands in Kansas and has stood, and in California too?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Undoubtedly; and I desire to say, as my friend puts the question, that I regard as a most lamentable fact in our history the carelessness with which between 1863 and 1865, or 1870, Congress dealt with the great function of incorporating these great highways. The development of the country from Puget Sound to the eastern shore of Lake Superior along that high latitude has been retarded for generations because it has seemed that the American Congress and the American people were not competent to endow and govern honestly, justly, carefully, with reference to the rights of the people and to protect them against the aggressions of the railroad companies. In my judgment one of the great solutions of this southern problem, which we have to deal with in the immediate future would have been to have provided for the growing up of free, intelligent, hard-working communities along these lines of railroads. I think one of the most distressing facts in our history is the example of carelessness and fraud which was set in the organization of these roads.

And now if my friend will permit me I will read the amendment which I propose to offer:

Provided, All such rights of way shall be subject to the authority of any State hereafter formed through which such road shall pass, as if the land occupied by such way had been originally granted by such State.

There can be no objection to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he move that as an addition to my amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let this be secured and then the House can vote on the other proposition. I offer this as an additional section, section 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not accomplish the purpose my amendment has in view.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHANKS. Before we reach section 5, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to section 4.

The SPEAKER. The House is not considering the bill by sections, and this will not cut off the gentleman's privilege. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend this to be an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No, sir; it is accepted by the gentleman who reported the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to accept the amendment. If it be not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] then the amendment first offered must be first disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana be again read.

The Clerk read the amendment, which was to add to section 2 the following:

Provided, however, That any State hereafter formed, within the limits of which a railroad, the right of way for which shall be obtained under the provisions of this act or any part thereof, shall be situated, shall have full authority at all times to regulate and limit the charges for the transportation of persons and freight over the same, so far as situated within its limits, and to prevent discrimination in such transportation.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will not press his amendment in that form.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentlemen here from the Territories, who are interested in these various railways, see no objection to this proposition, it is so palpably right. The States of this nation, in the hasty legislation of early days, did not reserve to themselves the necessary powers over transportation, and have now discovered their fatal mistake. This amendment simply proposes to reserve to the States that may be hereafter formed the same right that every State of this Union would now be glad to have had reserved to it. I do not see how it can be possible, with the present tone of public sentiment in this country, that gentlemen should consent to the passage of a bill through Congress inaugurating a vast system of railways for the possible future States of the great West, without any limitation or any reservation of right to the people through their legislators to regulate the subject of transportation.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, in order to see if he appreciates the difficulty which some of us feel in regard to the matter?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. The amendment of the gentleman provides, without allusion to the destination of the commerce passing over the road, that the State may regulate the charges upon it. The difficulty that we see is that that would by its terms give the State the right to regulate what may concern other States, interstate commerce. The proposition of the gentleman is to give the State the right to regulate within its own limits. He makes the exercise of the right depend upon the locality of the road, not upon the character of the commerce going over it. That would give the State the right to regulate commerce that may go into other States. The difficulty is that we cannot sustain a measure that would give a State the right to enforce charges that may be prohibitory of interstate commerce. Have I made myself understood?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, very clearly. The objection the gentleman suggests is the very one that occurred in the first consideration of this bill. But does not the gentleman perceive that I am asking only that the future States may have exactly the same rights that they would have if they had granted this right of way, just as other States have done recently? Nothing is proposed to be done except to leave future States in the same condition that present States are in that grant the right of way for railroads.

Mr. KASSON. Right there—let us get at it by conversation; we can do it. The gentleman proposes to give the State a right which they would not have under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. KASSON. To fix the rates of freight upon commerce coming from and going to other States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nobody pretends that.

Mr. KASSON. By this amendment it would seem that the United States attempted to give the States that right.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the State made this grant upon the condition of reserving the right to regulate transportation, would not that grant made by the State be subject to the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States? My amendment proposes to give to all prospective States the same powers that the States would reserve to themselves from time to time in granting this right of way. That has nothing to do with the power of Congress to regulate commerce, although I am willing to add these words, which I think, however, are supererogatory:

But this shall not be construed to limit the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will notice the wording of his amendment he will see the inconsistency which I refer to. He and I both desire to arrive at the same point. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved further, That any State hereafter formed, within the limits of which a railroad, the right of way for which shall be obtained under the provisions of this act, or any part thereof, shall be situate, shall have full authority at all times to regulate and limit the charges for the transportation of persons and freight over the same.

Mr. KASSON. Stop there. The gentleman will observe that his amendment gives the State the absolute right that Congress would have, by saying that they may exercise this right of regulation irrespective of the destination of the merchandise. It gives the States the power not only to do what one State has attempted to do before, impose restrictions so oppressive to interstate commerce——

Mr. HOLMAN. Cannot the State impose restrictions?

Mr. KASSON. Not at all upon transportation of commerce destined to another State.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can it not, independent of the question of the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States?

Mr. KASSON. Independent of the powers of Congress and of the restrictions imposed by the Constitution a State would have the right to do anything within its own limits.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, here are two distinct powers. One is the power of the State to regulate commerce within its own limits. This power I believe is generally conceded. Then here is another power—the power of the General Government to regulate interstate commerce. Now, these are separate and distinct powers. The reservation of this power to the State in this form to regulate commerce within its own limits does not interfere at all with the power of Congress to regulate commerce between that State and other States.

Mr. KASSON. I answer that the prohibitions or restrictions of the Constitution cannot be waived by Congress; and this looks like an attempt by Congress to waive its power in this respect and give it to a State.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to insert the words "but this provision shall not be construed to limit the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will give me his attention, I think he will see the force of the point made by the gentleman from Indiana. It is true that the jurisdiction of Congress over commerce between the States is exclusive, and that Congress cannot by any action delegate this jurisdiction to the States; but it is also true that the power of a State over corporations which it creates is unlimited. Take the analogous case of foreign commerce. A State cannot provide that no individual shall engage in foreign commerce, nor can it impose any terms or conditions on his engagement in such commerce; but it may provide that a corporation created by that State shall not engage in foreign commerce or shall engage in it only on certain terms and conditions. So a State may rightfully declare that a corporation which it has created shall engage only in transportation within the State, and shall not transport at all merchandise destined for other States, or shall transport only such merchandise as will pay certain rates or will submit to certain terms and conditions. Now, the effect of this proposition, if I understand it, is to authorize the States through which railroads incorporated by Congress pass to impose such conditions on the exercise of the function of those roads as common carriers as the States might impose if they had themselves created the corporations. In other words, it declares that certain corporations created by Congress shall transport passengers and merchandise only on such terms as the States through which they pass may hereafter prescribe.

Mr. KASSON. But the amendment will not answer the purpose unless we insert the language "local, or confined within the State."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not admit this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is rather late for the gentleman to make that announcement after the amendment has been discussed for half an hour. I ask for a vote on my proposition. My amendment was offered by the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and has been discussed fully half an hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I have the privilege of refusing to admit it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that allowing an amendment to be discussed for a considerable period is tantamount to waiving an objection to it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Before the amendment is voted on, I desire to say a single word. This bill does not propose to charter any corporation. It leaves to the Territories or the States where these public lands may lie, the right to charter such corporations as they may see fit for the construction of railroads. What does it do? It simply and only gives the right of way. It merely grants to such railroad companies as may be chartered the right to lay their tracks and run their trains over the public lands; it does nothing more. This is all that can be got out of it by any possible construction. The simple right being given to locate a road and operate cars upon the track so located, the gentleman from Indiana proposes by his amendment to raise the question of the right to control freights running over such roads. It seems to me that this should be left just as it is left to all the other States. When these Territories come to be admitted as States, (if they ever do,) they will certainly have the same power that all the other States have to regulate commerce. The gentleman from Indiana certainly does not deny that to Congress is reserved the exclusive control of interstate commerce, and that this power cannot be parted with; while to the State alone is reserved the right to control commerce strictly within the limits of the State. This power, which is a constitutional right, cannot be added to or taken from. Yet the gentleman from Indiana stands here and insists that Congress shall surrender a power which by the Constitution, as construed by the Supreme Court, has been vested in Congress alone. I insist that nothing ought to be said in the bill on this question.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, there were—ayes 28, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. This amendment is so important, affecting the rights of the people as well as corporations, that there should be a full vote.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 84.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment by striking out after the word "transportation" the words "situate within its limits" and inserting "exclusively within the State."

Mr. KASSON. I hope that such a modification will be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that with this modification the amendment will be satisfactory.

Mr. KASSON. It will be so to me.

The amendment as modified was read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have no objection to the amendment as now modified.

Mr. HOLMAN. In making this modification I acquiesce in the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] although the proposition in its present form does not come up to my own views of the extent to which we should go in this class of legislation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. With this modification I have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order for the yeas and nays will be reconsidered, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, as modified, will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now yield to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is pending, and it will first be disposed of.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR as follows:

Provided, That all such rights of way shall be subject to the authority of any State hereafter formed through which said railroads shall pass as if the lands occupied by such way had been originally granted by such State.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEGLEY. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Legislature of the proper Territory may provide for the manner in which private lands and possessory claims of the public lands of the United States may be condemned, or such condemnation may be made in accordance with section 3 of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and approved July 2, 1864.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHANKS. I move in the second and third lines of the fourth section to strike out these words, "without special authority of Congress;" and I do that as it seems to place over these Indian reservations a threat that Congress may sooner or later do this thing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to amend the title of the bill so it will read—

A bill granting to railroads right of way through the public lands of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

LITTLE COTTONWOOD CAÑON TOLL-ROAD, UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 3051) granting the right of way over the public lands for a toll-road in Little Cottonwood Cañon, in Salt Lake County, Utah Territory.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would like to ask the Speaker whether the authority given to the Committee on the Public Lands was an authority covering reports generally from the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The leave granted to the committee refers only to bills of a peculiar character relating to rights of way through the public domain, either general or special in their character.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back a bill (H. R. No. 3051) with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, provides that the right of way, four rods in width, over the public lands of the United States is thereby granted to Philip H. Emerson, Samuel Paul, Luke Voorhees, and George E. Whitney, and their associates, for the construction of a public toll-road from Granite, at the mouth of Little Cottonwood Cañon, in the county of Salt Lake, in the Territory of Utah, to the head of said cañon, the rates of toll to be charged upon said road not to exceed usual rates for similar roads, and to be approved by the county court of said Salt Lake County; in case said road is not constructed within two years from the passage of the act, this grant of right of way shall revert to the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask the Clerk now to read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional section:

SEC. 2. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time when the public interest may require the same.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to reserve the point of order, until the bill has been explained, as to whether this comes under the order of the House granted the other day. It seems to be a simple bill for a toll-road.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that when the order was made to consider bills to grant the right of way I was upon the floor and saw that the leave then granted included this bill. It contains nothing but a right of way for a toll-road. As to the merits of the bill, I say to the House that upon the rise of this hill there is a cañon leading up through the mountains, at the head of which there are several important mines. The petition asking for the passage of this bill comes principally from the owners of these mines, stating that it requires the greatest economy to mine their ores and transport them, and that the road formerly used has not been so constructed as to permit them to move their ores to market with that economy which will give them a return for their labor.

There is already constructed a part of the way a railroad that is in the interest of citizens who have lived for a number of years in Utah and who have entire control of it. The parties who petition for this bill apprehend that when this railroad is completed, if it is ever completed, so as to answer the purposes intended, it will place these miners entirely under the control of these railroad men, and that in consequence thereof there will be a monopoly so far as regards the rates that will be charged for transportation.

Now these people ask permission to construct a toll-road—nothing but the right of way; and they ask also that the charges that shall be made may be controlled by the county court. The committee on examining the bill arrived at the conclusion that there was no good objection to it. The provision is incorporated in the bill that if the road is not completed within two years the grant shall revert. The petition to which I have referred was unanimously signed and there comes no objection to it, except possibly from the parties interested in this railroad.

The committee have prepared and reported a bill granting the right of way to the railroad company; but inasmuch as the general bill which has just passed reaches their case, it has become unnecessary to act further upon that bill. But the House will observe that under the provisions of the bill just passed, should it become a law, this railroad company is authorized to complete their road. Therefore this right to construct a toll-road becomes necessary in the interest of these miners, and in the interest of all of these people who live at the head of this cañon.

Mr. KASSON. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that if it is a matter of public notoriety that this has been applied for by these gentlemen and that no opposition to it comes from the people, I have no objection. But as certain names were specified here, it was my fear that it might be desired to get a special privilege for these parties to the exclusion of others, which led me to ask for an explanation.

Mr. BRADLEY. I will say again that the committee have heard of no opposition from any party, except possibly those interested in that railroad. As a matter of fairness to all parties interested, I will state that, as chairman of the sub-committee having charge of the bill, I have been applied to to add other names; but I have learned that they are names of persons interested in the railroad. It appeared to the committee that the object in asking that these names be added was that the railroad company may not only control transportation over their road, but may also control the transportation over this toll-road; and the committee thought—at least I can say so for myself—that it was not advisable to add the names as requested. Should the gentlemen representing the other parties desire to make any remarks I will yield to them for that purpose.

Mr. HERNDON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question only?

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HERNDON. I wish to ask him this question: If it is not true that there has been a toll-road for the past twenty years over the same ground, and that that road has ceased to be a toll-road in the last few years; and if this bill should pass would it not renew the toll upon that road which has ceased within the past few years?

Mr. BRADLEY. I would reply to the gentleman from Texas by saying that I am informed that some time ago the road that is now being used was a toll-road, and that tolls at one time were collected upon it, but for the last few years it has been abandoned. I am informed also that the road proposed has been abandoned in consequence of its condition, and that it needs further improvement. I am credibly informed that these parties asking for this charter or right of way propose to construct a road that will answer for the purposes of transportation, while the road heretofore has not been in a condition to answer this purpose.

Mr. HERNDON. I desire to ask one other question. Is there any limitation in this bill as to the length of time this privilege shall be used by the persons to whom it is granted? May they not use it ninety-nine years or a thousand years, and hold this portion of land granted to them and have exclusive control over it for this purpose forever?

Mr. BRADLEY. The amendment I have sent to the desk reserves to Congress the right to amend, alter, or repeal at any time the provions of this act whenever the public interests shall require.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. That time comes never.

Mr. BRADLEY. For the purpose of disclosing the facts in regard to this matter I wish to say that the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company, that proposed to construct its road up through those cañons, is the same company to which I have previously referred as seeking to control this transportation. I hold in my hands a protest against the passage of this bill authorizing the completion of that railroad, and I send it to the desk that the prayer of the petition may be read. It sets forth the objections to the construction of that railroad, and also discloses the reasons why this bill, in the judgment of the committee, should pass. I ask the Clerk to read the petition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your memorialists represent that they are the owners and managers of the principal mines in Little Cottonwood Cañon, in Salt Lake County, in the Territory of Utah, and are engaged in operating and developing the same.

That said mines produce almost entirely argentiferous galena ores, and mostly of a low grade, so that for their profitable development the utmost economy is necessary in every department. Owing to the great altitude of the mineral belt and other causes, it is impossible to smelt and reduce the ores at or near the mines; but it is necessary to freight them down the cañon from fifteen to twenty miles. The Little Cottonwood Cañon is a narrow gorge throughout a large part of its distance, probably not averaging two or three hundred feet in width and from a short distance above its mouth is so steep that it is impracticable to either build or operate a railroad through it.

The attention of your memorialists has been drawn to House bill 1885, "a bill granting to the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph," introduced and referred February 9, 1874, and recommitted with amendments May 2, 1874.

Your memorialists protest against the passage of this bill at the present time, for the following reasons:

First. To grant to any corporation a right of way of two hundred feet in width through Little Cottonwood Cañon would be to place the approach to all the mines therein in the power of the corporation obtaining the franchise.

Second. First in importance to the mine-owners of the cañon is the construction of a good road, so that competition will reduce freights to the lowest figure; and as we believe a public free highway will not be constructed, we have heretofore memorialized your honorable body to grant the right of way for a toll-road to Philip H. Emerson, Samuel Paul, Luke Voorhees, and George E. Whitney, who, if allowed, we believe will construct a good and substantial improvement. If, then, an outlet by a highway having been secured, any persons desire to construct a railroad we certainly shall not object; but in every point of view the highway should have preference as a protection against dangerous monopoly.

Third. The construction and operation of a railroad above the point to which it is already constructed is believed to be impracticable, owing to the steepness of the grade; and the granting to the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company of the right to sit in the way of all improvements for five years would be a positive calamity to the cañon.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Michigan object to inserting the word "necessary" and the words "not exceeding" in the first line, so that it shall read "that the necessary right of way, not exceeding four rods in width," &c., so that if another road comes along they may have the right of way without trenching on the rights conferred here?

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. There is no objection to the gentlemen named as corporators for this road.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. There is objection to the idea of a toll-road being created at all in this cañon. There has been a road in existence there for upward of twenty years.

Mr. BRADLEY. If the gentleman from Utah will wait a moment I will yield to him directly so that he may have a chance to state the grounds of objection to the bill. I sent up the memorial to be read so that the House may understand the situation regarding the necessity of the construction of a road up this cañon. It is a protest against granting the right of way to the railroad company, but the Committee on the Public Lands passed upon both these bills and decided to report both favorably. The general railroad bill which has just passed the House gives the right of way now to the railroad company, and therefore it would be unfair to exclude the right of these parties and refuse them permission to construct this road. The committee are of opinion that two roads will answer the purposes desired by the people of this cañon better than one. I will now yield to the gentleman from Utah, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. If this should be made a toll-road the very arguments which are used in this petition are conclusive against its creation, because it would for years, or for as long as the road should be chartered, exclude the possibility of having a free road up that cañon. I agree with the gentleman who reports this bill from the Committee on the Public Lands that if the Jordan Valley and Wahsatch Railroad should have the exclusive right of way up that cañon to the detriment of the public highway or to the spoiling of the highway already in existence, his arguments and the arguments urged in this petition would be correct.

But, sir, it will be found that in the general bill which has just passed the House, in the second section, commencing at line 12, there is a provision which makes it necessary for a railroad company going up a cañon or occupying a narrow gorge already occupied by a public highway to make that highway still good and preserve it intact in its original entirety, so as not to impede travel by wagons. Therefore the objection which is brought against this Jordan Valley and Wahsatch road by this petition is obviated by the general bill just now passed by the House; and I submit, therefore, that there is no necessity for the passage of this bill. We have at the present time in Utah hundreds of miles of roads in cañons that are entirely free. If this be made a toll-road, it will be the first and only toll-road in existence in the Territory of Utah; and instead of facilitating the transportation of ore from the mines, it will be a means of taxing the transportation of that ore, and will not be in any way a benefit to the miners or in any way counteract the effect of the railroad that is proposed to be built up the cañon. I think, therefore, there is not the slightest necessity for the creation of this road into a toll-road.

Mr. BRADLEY. The gentleman from Utah says that it would be objectionable to pass this bill granting to these parties the right to collect tolls. But at the same time his railroad company is authorized to construct its railroad up there and charge whatever tolls it may see fit. These gentlemen, interested largely at the head of the cañon, are asking the construction of a toll-road, that it may be a protection against the excessive rates that may be charged by the railroad company.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. There is, as I have already said, a highway through this cañon that is constantly traveled over. I was there myself just before coming here. Teams are passing up and down it all the time without the least obstruction, and have been for twenty years and upward.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. BRADLEY. I will do so.

Mr. CLYMER. Without intending to express any opinion as to the necessity for this toll-road, I wish to offer a consideration which I think should govern the House in its determination of this question. It is that the Committee on the Public Lands, of which I have the honor to be a member, since my connection with it at least, has observed a uniform rule, which is to refuse acts of incorporation for the building of railroads anywhere. Now, with reference to this toll-road, it is proposed to do that indirectly which we have refused to do directly; for this bill provides that four gentlemen and their successors shall have the right to build this road, shall have the right of way for a certain width between certain points, and shall also have the right to collect tolls upon that road. My idea is this: If there is a necessity for a toll-road between these points, there is power in the territorial Legislature to control the matter. If there be such a necessity as would warrant the construction of this road, then we should send these parties to the territorial Legislature. If they become an incorporated company, then they can come here and by general legislation we can do for wagon-roads what we have done for a railroad in the bill passed to-day.

I think, with reference to this subject of toll-roads, that this House should not enter upon a field which will lead to endless legislation, and which may be doing, indirectly and unintentionally, great injustice to other interests in the Territory. If I had no other reasons than these I should vote against this bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I would like to ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. CLYMER] if he proposes to leave these gentlemen, these miners that are taking out hundreds and thousands of tons of ore annually, entirely in the hands of these railroad people? It is suggested that they may not now be incorporated. Yet if we give them the right of way, in order to enjoy this right and collect toll, they will necessarily have to go to the territorial Legislature for incorporation. And as a protection against extortion, against undue rates being charged, we have the railway company on the one hand to compete with them, and there is also the county court which has power given to it to control and establish their rates. I certainly see no objection to granting this measure of relief which is asked for by the entire property interest at the head of this cañon, these miners who are represented by the memorial which I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read. I now call the previous question.

Mr. CLYMER. Pending the call for the previous question, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay on the table, and upon a division there were—ayes 35, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRADLEY and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 59, noes 87.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Pending the call for the yeas and nays, I move that the House now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

INTEREST ON DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, asking an appropriation to pay interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, was granted leave of absence for ten days.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BRADLEY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and Mr. BRADLEY were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 79.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

TOLL-ROAD IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the bill (H. R. No. 3051) granting the right of way over the public lands for a toll-road in Little Cottonwood Cañon, in Salt Lake County, Utah Territory. Upon the vote by tellers, the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being upon a division—ayes 27, noes 103; one-fifth in the affirmative.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House now adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FINCK and Mr. FORT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 68, noes 76.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to lay the bill on the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to say to the House that this is the last bill the Committee on the Public Lands have to report at this time, and we desire to have it disposed of to-night. I hope the House will come to a vote on this bill before we adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to lay this bill on the table.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to upon a division—ayes 105, noes 28.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 113.

So (one-fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay the bill on the table having been decided in the negative upon the vote by tellers, the question recurs upon seconding the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time when the public interest may require the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. Third reading of an engrossed bill.

The Clerk read the bill by its title.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. It has just been read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The engrossed copy was not read in full.

The SPEAKER. When the Chair announces the third reading of an engrossed bill the reading of the bill by its title is sufficient, unless the reading of the bill in full be then demanded.

Mr. CESSNA. I make the point of order that the bill had been read a third time by its title before the gentleman from Iowa made the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets that he failed to recognize the gentleman from Iowa, but he did not hear the point made at the time when it was seasonable.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When is it seasonable?

The SPEAKER. The moment that the vote passes ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time, it is then the right of any member to demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. At that moment I rose. I cannot when I arise arrest the Clerk and prevent him from reading.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman failed to arrest any officer, it was the Speaker. After the Chair, following the vote ordering the bill to a third reading, announces "the third reading of an engrossed bill," it is too late to make the demand. But if the gentleman states that he rose in season, the Chair will regard him as in season.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Speaker could not hear me because the Clerk was reading. I do not want to get any advantage of the Speaker or the House. I rose in time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman so states, it is sufficient.

Mr. SENER. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SENER. Pending that I have moved to adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SENER; and there were—ayes 76, noes 74.

Several members called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we adjourn now, will not this bill come up the first thing to-morrow morning?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If it does, it will take so much longer.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was made a special order for to-day, and I would not object to finishing it, if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The previous question still operating upon the engrossment of the bill, a motion to reconsider having been made, the bill will come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. BRADLEY. Then I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending. Tellers have been ordered; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. WILSON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CESSNA.

Mr. BRADLEY. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa has withdrawn his demand for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. That is for the gentleman himself to state.

Mr. SENER. I have not withdrawn the motion to adjourn.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 14, 1874, in relation to alleged changes in the laws imposing duties on imports or new constructions of such laws made by his Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two days.

ADJOURNMENT.

The House divided on the motion to adjourn; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, relating to the building of the custom-house in Cincinnati, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, resolutions of the Western Tobacco-Cutters' Association, opposing any change in existing law relating to manufactured tobacco, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the Tobacco Board of Trade of Louisville, Kentucky, of similar import, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of J. H. Merrill, for relief, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Free Young Men's Benevolent Association of the District of Columbia, for authority to sell abandoned cemetery in square No. 272, and to devote the proceeds to maintaining a new burial ground, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition for the adjustment of freight bills in the District of Columbia, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. COX: Memorial of National Reform Association, of New York City, in regard to reduction of cost in the collection of revenue, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GUNCKEL: The petition of Milton Kennedy, of Portsmouth, Ohio, to be paid for the use and services of the steamboat Piketon and her crew in the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENDEE: The petition of Mrs. John H. Peck, of Burlington, Vermont, for indemnity for imprisonment of her husband in the Old Capitol prison during the rebellion, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HUBBELL: Petitions of Smith & Harris and 73 others, of Houghton, Michigan; of J. M. Wilkinson and 63 other business men of Marquette, Michigan; of William W. Wheaton and 111 others, of H. J. Lobdell and 34 others, of Ambrose Campbell and 463 others, citizens of Marquette, and of Marquette County, Michigan, for the passage of the bill H. R. No. 3830, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Joseph M. Clark and 49 others, of Charlevoix, Michigan, for an appropriation to improve Pine River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty taken off leading foreign products in 1872, and for the passage of the currency bill submitted by Hon. W. D. KELLEY, providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of Jane M. Way, asking that the Secretary of War may be authorized to amend the record of the late Major George B. Way, additional paymaster United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAYNARD. The petition of A. J. Parkhurst, W. T. Willis, and 68 others, for a post-route from Dixon's Springs, in Smith County, Tennessee, to Gibbs Cross-roads, in Macon County, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the memorial of John James Flournoy, of Georgia, praying Government aid to enable the colored race to remove to Liberia and settle in that republic, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of William May, sr., of Spencer County, Iowa, for increase of pension to his insane son, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Elizabeth O'Neill, mother of John O'Neill, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Maria W. Sanders, widow of Major W. Sanders, late surgeon United States Army, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RANSIER: The petition of Louis J. Barbot and others, for the passage of the bill H. R. No. 3656, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of Mary J. Griffey, of North Carolina, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of Eliza C. Wrenn, of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, to be compensated for injury to property and losses of personalty during the war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of New York: The petition of citizens of Elmira, New York, for an amendment of the fourteenth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of H. M. Davis, legal representative of Milton I. Davis, late sergeant Ninth Ohio Cavalry, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Hovey, Janes & Co. and others, of Marietta, Ohio, for the repeal of the tax on matches, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Hovey, Janes & Co. and others, of Marietta, Ohio, for the passage of the bill defining a gross of matches, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STANDIFORD: The petition of Alfred Froman and others, of Louisville, Kentucky, depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, asking Congress to take such action as will result in winding up the business of said company at the earliest possible day, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, the petition of Horace Morris and others, of Kentucky, depositors in the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, that the United States assume the liabilities of said company, and for other relief, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of the trustees of Rutherford College, Burke County, North Carolina, for aid, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAY OF OFFICERS MUSTERED OUT BUT REAPPOINTED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870.

The amendments were, first, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert:

That hereafter whenever any person who was mustered out as a supernumerary officer of the Army with one year's pay and allowances in addition to the pay and allowances due him at the date of his discharge under the provisions of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes, approved July 15, 1870, shall be reappointed by the President an officer of the Army, such appointment shall be under and with the express condition that 50 per cent. of such officer's pay shall be stopped monthly until the sum total of the extra year's pay and allowances received by him when mustered out as aforesaid shall have been refunded to the United States.

And, second, to amend the title so as to read:

A bill to provide for repayment of certain moneys paid to officers mustered out of the Army as supernumeraries but subsequently reappointed by the President.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not present. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs with the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of national banks of Tennessee, praying for a modification of the laws in relation to the taxation of national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, and of citizens of that city, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Charleston; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented the memorial of the grand and petit jurors of the western district of Arkansas, the United States attorneys for the eastern and western districts, and the district judge for the district of Arkansas, praying for the passage of a bill to organize the district of Oklahoma and provide for courts therein; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. I also present the memorial of Robert Anderson, opposing the ratification of an Indian treaty and praying the preservation of certain vested rights under the same. This memorial is in print, without any written signature, and reached me by mail; but as it is addressed to the Senate of the United States, I present it and move its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial of Daniel Richards, a citizen of the United States, resident in San Francisco, who relates the circumstances of the killing of his wife and several others on the 24th of July, 1873, at old Camp Brown, in the Territory of Wyoming, by certain bands of the Sioux and Arapahoes, and describes in detail the property which was stolen at that time and destroyed. From the narrative given in this document it would seem to have been a very atrocious case. The prayer of the memorial is that Congress detain the amount from the annuities due to these tribes under treaty stipulations, and on proper proof to the Department of the Interior cause payment to be made to the sufferers for the losses which they have sustained. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of James Calloway, of Sullivan County, Indiana, a man of color, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of John G. Miller, of Mississippi, praying for compensation for thirty-two bales of cotton taken from him in February, 1865, by the United States forces; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4306) to place Lawrence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, upon the retired list of the Army; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Webster, praying additional compensation for building a wharf and keeping the same in repair at Newport News for the use of the Army of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was concurred in and ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Finance yesterday reported to the Senate the bill (S. No. 964) to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties. There was referred to the same committee a resolution of the Importers and Grocers' Board of Trade of New York in favor of such revision, and I report the same back at this time, and ask that it lie on the table. I desire to say now that immediately after the expiration of the morning business I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported yesterday, there being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and I think there will be no objection, as the necessity for the early passage of the law is very clear.

Mr. SCOTT. In reference to the request just made by the Senator from Iowa, I will state to him that I hope he will defer calling up that bill for a day or two. I shall have no objection perhaps to interpose at that time, but I desire a delay of a day or two before that bill shall be considered.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3478) in relation to parties in the Court of Claims, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In making that report I ask leave to say that upon an examination of the bill a portion of the committee are satisfied that, whether so intended or not, the bill would have the effect of relieving parties in the Court of Claims from the operation of the statute of limitations, and for that reason would have reported it back adversely, but a majority of the committee think that on that account it ought to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. That is the reason this report is made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 77) for the relief of Martha A. Booth, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely; and leave was granted to the petitioner to withdraw her petition and papers.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas M. Redd, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by United States troops in 1864, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1121) for the relief of Thomas M. Redd; the bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 435) to amend the act entitled "An act to restore a part of the Round Vally Indian reservation, in California, to the public lands, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1873, to report it back adversely. I call the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to the bill, and if he desires it to go on the Calendar with the adverse report, I shall not object; otherwise I will move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

WESTERN BOUNDARY OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. MCCREERY. The Committee on Indian Affairs have had under consideration the bill (S. No. 679) to establish the boundary line between the State of Arkansas and the Indian country, and have directed me to report it to the Senate and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. DORSEY. I see that my colleague [Mr. CLAYTON] is not in his seat, and, although the matter of the bill may be correct, I would ask the Senator to defer his request until my colleague is here.

Mr. MCCREERY. The Senator's colleague concurs in the view I take of this matter. It is merely to mark the old boundary line between Arkansas and the Indian Territory. There is no objection that I have heard of on the part of anybody. The Government has sold and conveyed the land up to the line, and this bill proposes that the old line shall be marked and established, so as to make a certainty where there is at present an uncertainty.

Mr. DORSEY. I would ask the Senator if it changes the present line?

Mr. MCCREERY. It is to mark the old line, the original line. It is no change of line. It is to show where the old established line is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, is it the object to consider this bill at this time? I suggest that the bill go on the Calendar, not that I am opposed to the bill, but I know that the question of the line of Arkansas has been a disputed and very serious question for a great many years. I would rather the bill should be postponed for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One objection carries the bill over.

Mr. BOGY. Let it go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1122) concerning naturalization; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1123) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to consider the application of John Fritz for extension of patent for rolling iron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1124) for the relief of William H. Powell and F. A. McDowell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1125) for the relief of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad Company, successor of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company of the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1126) for the relief of Langdon C. Easton; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be requested to inquire if any revision of the postal laws is required to prevent smuggling in mailed packages, and if the expenses of the Department can be decreased by using slow or accommodation trains for any part of the mail matter of the second or third class, and if any revision of rates can be made by which the receipts may be increased without impairing the ability of the Department to serve the people as their agency for communicating intelligence and disseminating information.

CESSION OF BEDS OF LAKES TO THE STATES.

Mr. PRATT. If the morning business is through, I move that Senate bill No. 281, to which I referred yesterday, may be taken up for the purpose of allowing me to submit some remarks to the Senate on the merits of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 281) ceding to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of unsurveyed lakes and other bodies of water was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask that the bill be read with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Lands.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That the United States do hereby cede to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of all lakes and other bodies of water which have not been heretofore included in the survey of the public lands and reservations by reason of their being covered by water, or which may not hereafter be included in future surveys for that reason, to the end that the proprietary right in and jurisdiction over the same may vest in such States respectively.

The Committee on Public Lands proposed to amend the bill so as to make it read:

That the United States do hereby cede to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of all lakes, ponds, and bayous of water not navigable, which have not been included in the surveys of the public lands and reservations by reason of their being covered by water, and where all of the contiguous surveyed lands have been granted, sold, or taken under the pre-emption or homestead laws, to the end that the proprietary right in and jurisdiction over the beds of such unsurveyed lakes, ponds, and bayous may vest in said States respectively.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to make one suggestion in reference to the bill. I dare say that in the Western States the bill would be fair and proper in its operation; but there are some exceptional cases on my coast which I think the bill would improperly affect. For instance, some lakes are used as reservoirs for mining and agricultural purposes, improved in that respect under the laws of the United States. There has been no title granted, but simply a license of use. I should like to have the bill so guarded that where any private rights have been acquired under the laws of the United States, this bill shall not affect them.

Mr. PRATT. I will propose an amendment myself to that effect, or the Senator from California can propose one after I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. MORTON. My colleague, I think, had in contemplation an amendment to his original bill.

Mr. PRATT. I have the amendment here to which my colleague refers, and I will send it to him so that he can offer it as an amendment to the bill after I have concluded my remarks. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. President, I now ask that the Clerk read the report which was made on this bill on the 2d of March, 1874.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Lands, on the 2d of March, 1874:

The committee have amended the bill so that the cessions to the State shall embrace the beds of all lakes, ponds, and bayous of water not navigable, which have not been included in the surveys of the public lands and reservations by reason of their being covered by water, and where all of the contiguous surveyed lands have been granted, sold, or taken under the pre-emption or homestead laws. They have also amended the title so as to conform to the amended text of the bill.

The reasons in support of the measure are as follows:

1. The bill does not interfere with any body of water situate in the public-land States which is a public highway by reason of its navigability.

2. Nor does it interfere with such shallow lakes or other bodies of water as are in the interior of sections and not meandered, but which are treated and disposed of as parts of the sections.

3. But, on the contrary, it relates only to such bodies of water as have been meandered, and where the contiguous surveyed lands have all been disposed of and nothing is left but the beds covered by water, which have not been and are not capable of being surveyed and disposed of as part of the public domain. As to these, the committee regard the title as a barren and unproductive one, which the United States have no interest in retaining.

Congress has made no provision by law for draining these bodies of water. It has no motive for doing so. The lands reclaimed would not justify the expense.

Nor has Congress passed any law known to the committee extending any police authority over those waters. They remain common property for all such as choose to take fish or ice therefrom, or to utilize the water in any form, or the sand or soil under the water.

When the waters have receded from the original line at the time of the surveys, the rim laid bare has generally been taken possession of by the owners of contiguous lands and reduced to possession under what is claimed as riparian rights.

In some instances the States have asserted jurisdiction over the waters by enacting laws for the protection of fish, regulating the seasons and manner in which they may be taken.

Where these lakes and ponds are situated in the neighborhood of considerable towns or cities or upon lines of railway reaching them, the franchise of taking ice therefrom has become a valuable one. But neither the State nor the General Government has established any regulation upon the subject, and every one engaged in the business acts upon his own motion, and collisions are sometimes the consequence or are likely to happen. Of course no revenue is derived either to the State or nation.

State or county pride would take measures to make these lakes attractive places of resort for recreation, but for the fact that they are regarded as the property of the United States. Even as they are, old people and young, during the warm season, resort to them in great numbers with their basket-dinners and find pleasant relief from the monotony of toil. There is no pleasanter sight than these little picnic parties camped upon the margin of a bright little lake, making their first experiments in canoe navigation. Simple enough is the pleasure, but it is a healthful and moral one, refreshing to the mind and body.

Now, it is apparent that should these small bodies of water ever become dry land by evaporation or other natural process it will be at remote periods, when the offices of the surveyors-general have been closed, and the survey and sale of the beds will not be justified by the returns of the sale of the lands.

Finally, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, dated January 27, 1873, (Executive Document No. 31,) expresses the opinion that it would be good policy to grant them to the respective States in which they are situated, and he furnishes the following reasons:

1. Most of them, if drained at all, will have to be drained by and at the expense of the State, as the General Government makes no provision for drainage in such cases.

2. If they become dry by natural process, it is usually long after the offices of the surveyors-general have been closed, and the duty of supervising the surveys devolves upon this office, which is remote from the field of operations, and therefore unable to supervise the letting of contracts and the execution of the work with that care that is necessary.

3. If the Government retains control over these lakes until they have been drained or become dry by evaporation or other natural process, the survey and sale of the same will be prolonged indefinitely, and their survey and sale in small quantities from time to time will not be profitable.

For these reasons the committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, little needs to be added to what is said in the report to justify the passage of this bill. The proposition to give the beds of these lakes, ponds, and bayous to the States in which they lie is not a new one. The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his late report advises it. Congress in 1873 established the principle, in granting the bed of Beaver Lake to the State of Indiana, though its area was computed to amount to about fourteen thousand acres, and had been mostly drained. The reasons in favor of this measure are numerous, and I can imagine no valid objection against it. The bill contemplates the cession only when these bodies of water have been meandered in the public surveys and all the surrounding lands have been disposed of. They were meandered because they could not be surveyed. There is no existing law under which title to the beds can now be acquired. The title is in the United States, and will remain there until by this or some other measure it is ceded. It is not often that individuals would care about purchasing the beds of these lakes, even if provision were made by law, except in fragmentary portions, to carry out some enterprise. Congress has not by any legislation sought to protect these bodies of water from intrusion or made any regulations whatever in relation to the taking of fish or ice therefrom, nor interfered to prevent adjacent proprietors from appropriating any portion of the beds which may be laid bare by the recession of the waters. Wherever any such proprietor includes what was not embraced in his certificate of entry—what is not conferred by his patent—he gets to himself what belongs to all, and gives cause of complaint to his neighbor whose land does not happen to abut on the lake.

It is a fact true of all the lakes with which I am familiar, that since the settlement of the country these waters have been gradually shrinking, laying bare a circular belt that was covered by water at the time the public surveys were made. There is no statute that I am aware of which provides for the sale or disposition of the bed thus laid bare. Quite lately, however, a circular has emanated from the Department of the Interior which points out a method for acquiring title, which I beg leave to read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1874.

As inquiries arise in regard to the survey of the beds of meandered lakes or other similar bodies of water in districts where the office of surveyor-general has been discontinued, the following is communicated as defining the conditions under which such lake-beds are regarded as surveyable, and as giving the proper mode of proceeding to have the same surveyed and to obtain title thereto:

The beds of lakes, (not navigable,) sloughs, and ponds, over which the lines of the public surveys were not extended at the date of the original survey, but which from the presence of water at the date of such survey were meandered, are held to be the property of the United States; and whenever, by evaporation or the operation of any other cause, natural or artificial, the waters of such lake, slough, or pond have so permanently receded or dried up as to leave within the unsurveyed area dry land fit in ordinary seasons for agricultural purposes, such dry land is subject to survey and sale under the general laws regulating the disposal of the public domain.

Such surveys will be ordered and, upon approval, disposition proceeded with in the following cases:

First. Where the waters have so far permanently receded or disappeared as to permit, during the ordinary surveying season, (not on the ice,) the actual extension of the lines of survey and the establishment and marking of corners in the manner required by law over the whole area of the bed of such former lake.

Second. Where the waters have not generally disappeared, but where they have so far permanently receded as to leave a margin of dry land fit for cultivation between the original meandered lines and the remaining waters of sufficient area to admit of the survey and of the establishment of at least three of the corners of a quarter section.

Third. The Commissioner of the General Land Office will consider the question of ordering a survey of margins not admitting the laying off of one hundred and sixty acres but not less than forty acres.

Parties desiring the survey of such lands may make application in writing to the Commissioner of the General Land Office therefor, stating the approximate area and the situation of the tract with reference to the section, township, and range of the public surveys, the same to be illustrated by a diagram; the fact that the waters have disappeared in the manner or to the extent as specified in one of the three several above-specified cases—such statement to be accompanied with the affidavit of at least two credible and disinterested witnesses as to the disappearance of the waters, the probable quantity of land capable of being surveyed in the whole area lying between the original meandered line and the then margin of the waters, and showing what proportion of such area is fit for agricultural purposes. To insure prompt attention and decision by this office, both the statement and affidavits required must be full and specific.

If, upon examination of such statement, diagram, and proof, it is found that such survey may be properly allowed, the parties applying will be so notified, and upon their designating to this office the name and residence of some competent and reliable surveyor, together with a statement from him in writing of the amount for which he is willing to execute the field-work of the survey, and a certificate of some United States depositary that the amount specified has been deposited to the credit of the United States "on account of individual depositors," the Commissioner will then issue the necessary instructions to the surveyor to enable him to execute the field-work of survey in accordance with the public-land system.

To correct what seems to be a very general misapprehension as to the manner in which persons may proceed to perfect title who have made actual settlement on lands of the character herein designated, and who claim or propose to claim under the pre-emption laws of the United States, it is remarked that in no event and at no stage of the proceedings can their declaratory statements be received or filed in this office. Such declaratory statements must be filed in the local land office, and cannot be there received until after such survey has been made and the approved plat thereof filed in the local office.

It is proper to further state that the fact of having borne the expense of survey will give no priority of claim or right, under existing laws, to purchase the land, or in any manner affect the vested interest of any party thereto, should such exist, as the land, when surveyed, will be subject to disposal according to the laws of Congress and the regulations of this office relative to the disposal of lands embraced in fragmentary surveys.

In case the lake bed is small and is so situated that no township, section, or quarter-section corners will need to be established by reason of such lake being situated within a given section or sections fully surveyed, no deposit will be required; and upon proof being furnished this office as above of the disappearance of the water, the premises will be platted, and the land can then be disposed of under existing laws.

Respectfully,

S. S. BURDETT,
Commissioner.

In speaking of these regulations, the Commissioner of the General Land Office uses this language:

These regulations are not new in their substance, but are simply a formulation of the pre-existing practice of the office as heretofore administered with reference to the class of lands to which they apply. An examination of the laws now in force, embracing the subject of the survey of the public lands, discloses the fact that the authority for conducting the operations embraced by the circular quoted is very meager, and that in fact such authority rests more on official practice than on specific enactment. The whole subject is worthy the attention of Congress, and indeed both public and private interests require its early settlement. These fragmentary portions of the public domain are often found in localities which, from nearness to growing cities and villages, or from being within thickly and long-settled neighborhoods, give them a value far beyond the Government price of public land; generally they are so situated as to be capable of entire reclamation, and would be so reclaimed could they by being transferred to private ownership be brought within the operation of State laws on the subject of drainage. It is often, and no doubt with reason, asserted that the health as well as the material growth of neighborhoods where such ponds and sloughs are situated is deleteriously affected by their continuance in an unreclaimed or partially reclaimed condition. I am of the opinion that, in view of all the circumstances, these lands might well be transferred to the States where situated, under such conditions as would protect any rights legally initiated under the homestead and pre-emption laws and secure their early reclamation.

Here, sir, is a frank confession by the Commissioner that his authority for this mode of disposition is found not in any specific enactment, but rests on official practice. You will observe, too, that for excellent reasons stated by him he recommends the transfer of these bodies of water, or rather that portion of the public domain which underlies them, to the States in which they are situated. I invoke that recommendation in the consideration of this bill. If there are any further safeguards which any one can suggest, proper to be inserted in the bill for the protection of private rights acquired, in making this transfer, I shall not oppose them. My main object is to divest the United States of a title wholly barren to them for any useful purpose, and vest these bodies of water in the States, who in many ways may utilize them, or if not that, preserve them for the common benefit under regulations they are better prepared to frame than Congress.

Bear in mind this cession is made, not to individuals, not to corporations, but to the States, the several States within whose bounds they lie.

In the disposition of the public lands Congress has manifested great liberality to the new States from the beginning. I pass by the traditional reservations in every enabling act looking to the admission of a State into the Union—such as of all salt springs and the lands adjacent—the reservation at first of the sixteenth and afterward of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in every township for the use of schools, and the other reservations for the seats of government and the establishment of seminaries of learning in the new States. I pass these all by to invite the attention of the Senate to grants on a still more liberal scale to the States.

You will recall, sir, the act of 4th of September, 1841, which granted five hundred thousand acres for internal improvements to each one of certain States where public lands yet remained, and 10 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales to other States. You will recall the still later legislation which turned over to the States within which they were situated all the swamp and overflowed lands unfit for cultivation, amounting, it is supposed, to sixty million acres, and of which fifty million have already been selected.

You will not fail to remember a still later law which gave to States having no public lands agricultural college scrip calling for eight million acres, and to the remaining States selected lands within their own boundaries of more than seven million acres—fifteen million in all for the founding and support of agricultural colleges.

All these liberal grants so unstintedly made are both precedents and arguments in favor of this bill; especially that one which turned over to the States all the swamp or overflowed lands within their limits. How small the bounty now asked appears in the face of the millions of acres granted already to the States in the interest of education and internal improvements, and for the purpose of reclamation of those that were worthless. And yet I have enumerated but a part of the grants to the States. To five of them four and one-half million acres have been granted for canal purposes. To States and corporations for railroad and wagon-road purposes Congress has given during the last twenty-five years two hundred and ten million acres, of which quantity twenty-five million have already been certified or patented under the grants.

We have still remaining unsurveyed of the public domain, omitting Alaska in the count, upward of eight hundred million acres, and how are we disposing of it? Certainly I am not criticising, much less condemning, the policy heretofore pursued but which is now being abandoned. It is a startling fact, however, that under the various laws giving bounty lands to soldiers, land warrants calling for seventy-four million acres have been issued and more than seventy million acres have been located with them. Had the soldiers got these lands, as was intended, the whole country would look back with satisfaction upon these grants although large enough to form three States of the size of Indiana. But in point of fact the warrants were mostly sold at enormous discount and fell into the hands of speculators largely, who reaped the bounty intended for the soldier.

We dispose of the public lands at present almost exclusively under the pre-emption and homestead laws, which require actual settlement and cultivation. There is a growing sentiment in the country that our land system should be still further simplified and amended so that all lands susceptible of use for grazing or agricultural purposes shall be taken up exclusively under the homestead system, and that we abandon altogether the practice of deriving an income from their sale.

Of the nine and a half million acres disposed of during the last fiscal year but one million was sold for cash, while more than three and a half millions were entered under the homestead law. The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends in his last report the consolidation of the main features of the pre-emption and homestead laws into one general statute.

Formerly the sales of the public lands constituted an important item in the revenues of the Government. In one famous year the sales amounted to $15,000,000. The pioneer settlers in my own State paid to the United States $16,000,000 for their homes.

But this policy has been mea urably abandoned, as may easily be seen in comparing the amount sold with the number of acres surveyed.

During the last fiscal year the cash receipts from this source were only the third of 1 per cent. on the entire amount of revenue collected.

In the future the great mass of these lands will pass into the hands of actual settlers under the homestead laws, and nothing in the form of money will be realized from them beyond the prescribed fees to be paid the land officers. Such I do not doubt will become the permanent policy. The whole nation has spoken as one man in denunciation of the practice of bestowing them upon corporations, to be suspended from sale during their pleasure and to be sold at last at such prices as they choose to exact of the settlers.

Now, sir, to return to the bill under consideration, I ask what does it grant that the United States have any interest in retaining? Simply submerged lands of no present value to the Government and which Congress will not appropriate money to reclaim or even to survey when by evaporation or other causes a part of the bed once covered by water is laid bare. The Land Department holds that even when surveyed the reclaimed land is subject to the pre-emption laws like other public lands. What a paltry income at best are they ever likely to yield? They can be surveyed now only at the instance of private parties and at their own cost. Even for this no statute exists. It rests for validity simply upon a practice which has grown up in the Department and has never been rebuked by Congress.

Now, sir, on the other hand, what reasons exist why the States should control these bodies of water and own the beds beneath them?

Because it is not meet and proper that the United States should hold lands in the States for other purposes than those enumerated in the Constitution; because as situated now they yield no revenue to the Government; because Congress has extended no regulations over them to make them subservient in equal degree to the uses of all and prevent private appropriation; because in the absence of regulations collisions may occur, and have occurred, in consequence of parties asserting exclusive rights, either in actual appropriation of the shores or in the way of taking fish or cutting ice; because frequently they cause malarial fevers, which the States would take measures to prevent if they had control over them. Grant them to the States and they will make them what they ought to be, attractive and healthful places of resort, and institute over them such regulations as shall make them in fact the common property of all the people, or where not serviceable for such purposes will reclaim and render them productive lands.

Sir, these lakes have all of them an unwritten history, and tradition has invested many of them with poetic mystery. They bear strange names crystallizing Indian superstitions which peopled them with demons and monsters. There is one of them in my own neighborhood, a beautiful sheet of water shining like a gem in the landscape, which bears the significant name of Manitou, or the Devil's Lake. The country about it was peopled with tribes that have long since passed away, but which held sway there when the tempest-tossed barks landed the first Europeans on the shores of Massachusetts and Virginia. The early pioneers, full of the Indian traditions, were possessed of the belief that this lake was in truth inhabited by a monster fish. Two men claimed to have seen it, and were so paralyzed with horror at its size and aspect that their accounts were confused in particulars. Marvelous were the accounts, however, they gave of the size of its head, the length of its body, the extraordinary dimensions of its mouth, and the commotion of the waters. The little town was ablaze with excitement. A public meeting was held, the subject discussed, and committees appointed to take measures to capture the monster. This, of course, was many years ago, while the Indians still lingered in the country; and if Senators smile at the credulity of the early settlers, let them remember that the great sea-serpent is still seen periodically off the coast of New England, and whether they believe it or not, their constituents do.

Now, sir, these old superstitions invest these waters with poetic interest, as I have said, which finds expression to this day in many a tale and ballad. Sentimental young men and ladies delight in the fancy that these flashing waters once bore the light canoes of Indian warriors; that over their shimmering surface, in the still summer's night, floated the plaintive music of the Indian lover. Here upon these banks strange religious rites were performed. Here grave council-fires were lighted and questions of war were debated. All this is fancy, to be sure, or dim tradition; but who shall measure the satisfaction the human soul takes in just such fancies? But it is not all fancy, as I will show by an event which has passed into history. Between Lakes Huron and Saint Clair, according to the veracious account of Walk-in-the-Water, where Malden now stands, a fleet gathered more than two hundred years ago, ten times larger than Perry's. This point was the rendezvous for the tribes which dwelt upon the shores of Michigan—Superior and Huron. It was a confederation of the Wyandottes, Pottawatomies, and Hurons for punishing the Senecas, who, during the winter before, had fallen upon the Wyandottes and killed many of their warriors. There were two hundred birch canoes at the rendezvous rocking upon the blue waters of the strait, each manned with four men to paddle, with four men to fight, all under the command of a warrior captain. The squadron of the Senecas was of equal size but their canoes less manageable. The engagement between the hostile fleets took place near where Buffalo now stands. It was long, fierce, and sanguinary. It ended as all battles must, and all the Senecas except one were killed or taken prisoners. Two hundred of these prisoners were carried ashore, a funeral pyre was made of their canoes and the wounded warriors perished in the flames. In the size of the hostile fleets, the number of the combatants, the severity of the conflict, and the extent of the destruction, the historian well says, this naval engagement on Lake Erie exceeded that of Perry's with the British.

But, sir, I ask pardon of the Senate for being betrayed into so much sentiment in discussing so practical a question as whether this bill should pass. I was trying to give reasons why the States should possess these bodies of water around so many of which cling so much of romance, so much of Indian tradition, which will find its way into the grave pages of history when these countries now young become old, and which is now preserved in song and fireside tales. The human heart is so constituted as to feel the most lively interest in spots which have been made memorable by great events, or even by acts of heroism or strange adventure. Why do we cross the ocean to visit the great battle-fields of the Old World? Why did the people of Indiana write it down in the constitution of the State that it should be the duty of the General Assembly to provide for the permanent inclosure and preservation of the Tippecanoe battle-ground? It is now sixty-four years since seven hundred white troops fought there in the early morning against the Indians marshaled by Tecumseh's brother. It would have scarcely been a respectable skirmish in the late civil war. Yet the spot is a sacred one to-day in my State, and no pains are spared to keep alive the memory of that early battle and those who participated in it. My predecessor in this Chamber, General Tipton, was a young lieutenant in that battle and owed much of his subsequent success to his gallantry on that day.

At the last session the Senate passed a bill dedicating to the public a large part of the military reservation on the island of Mackinac, for a park. Thousands of acres lying in two Territories have been carved out of the public domain upon the head-waters of the Yellowstone and reserved for a national park. So, too, of the Yosemite Valley. If I am charged with sentiment in the advocacy of the bill, I reply that it is sentiment which has dedicated these places to the common enjoyment of the people; but I do not choose to base this claim on sentiment alone. These bodies of water are not navigable in any commercial sense. They can be of no possible use to the Government. Congress has abdicated—if that is a proper expression—all authority over them. The States can utilize them and want them. Never doubt, sir, if they have authority over them, it will be so exerted as to make them pleasant resorts for young and old, and that in their hands they will yield a revenue not the less valuable because not susceptible of being measured by dollars and cents.

Mr. President, in a few weeks more I shall cease to be a member of this body. Senators have not failed to see that this bill is a pet scheme of mine. I would fain carry with me into my retirement the consciousness that I have contributed to place upon the statute-book a measure which will commend me to somebody's gratitude. I think I shall experience a positive satisfaction when I visit, as I often do, the beautiful lakes which gem the northern part of my State in the reflection that they are now hers, and hers because of my suggestion and of the kindness with which the Senate has listened to my advocacy. I think, sir, when I shall have exchanged the perplexities, the anxieties and toils of legislation for the pastime of fishing, I shall angle and spear for bass and pickerel with a conscience freer of offense in the knowledge that I am not violating in these waters any rights of the United States.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, with accompanying papers. The message will be read.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to make the following answer to a Senate resolution of the 8th instant, asking for information as to any interference, by any military officer or any part of the Army of the United States, with the organization or proceedings of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana or either branch thereof; and also inquiring in regard to the existence of armed organizations in that State, hostile to the government thereof, and intent on overturning such government by force.

To say that lawlessness, turbulence, and bloodshed have characterized the political affairs of that State since its reorganization under the reconstruction acts is only to repeat what has become well known as a part of its unhappy history; but it may be proper here to refer to the election of 1868, by which the republican vote of the State, through fraud and violence, was reduced to a few thousands, and the bloody riots of 1866 and 1868, to show that the disorders there are not due to any recent causes or to any late action of the Federal authorities.

Preparatory to the election of 1872 a shameful and undisguised conspiracy was formed to carry that election against the republicans without regard to law or right, and to that end the most glaring frauds and forgeries were committed in the returns after many colored citizens had been denied registration and others deterred by fear from casting their ballots.

When the time came for a final canvass of the votes, in view of the foregoing facts, William P. Kellogg, the republican candidate for governor, brought suit upon the equity side of the United States circuit court for Louisiana, and against Warmoth and others, who had obtained possession of the returns of the election, representing that several thousand voters of the State had been deprived of the elective franchise on account of their color, and praying that steps might be taken to have said votes counted, and for general relief. To enable the court to inquire as to the truth of these allegations, a temporary restraining order was issued against the defendants, which was at once wholly disregarded and treated with contempt by those to whom it was directed. These proceedings have been widely denounced as an unwarrantable interference by the Federal judiciary with the election of State officers; but it is to be remembered that by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States the political equality of colored citizens is secured, and under the second section of that amendment, providing that Congress shall have power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation, an act was passed on the 31st of May, 1870, and amended in 1871, the object of which was to prevent the denial or abridgment of suffrage to citizens, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and it has been held by all the Federal judges before whom the question has arisen, including Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court, that the protection afforded by this amendment and these acts extends to State as well as other elections. That it is the duty of the Federal courts to enforce the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof is too clear for controversy.

Section 15 of said act, after numerous provisions therein to prevent an evasion of the fifteenth amendment, provides that the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the provisions of said act and of the act amendatory thereof. Congress seems to have contemplated equitable as well as legal proceedings to prevent the denial of suffrage to colored citizens; and it may be safely asserted that, if Kellogg's bill in the above-named case did not present a case for the equitable interposition of the court, no such case can arise under the act. That the courts of the United States have the right to interfere in various ways with State elections so as to maintain political equality and rights therein, irrespective of race or color, is comparatively a new, and to some seems to be a startling idea, but it results as clearly from the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution and the acts that have been passed to enforce that amendment, as the abrogation of State laws upholding slavery results from the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. While the jurisdiction of the court in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth and others is clear to my mind, it seems that some of the orders made by the judge in that and the kindred case of Antoine were illegal. But while they are so held and considered, it is not to be forgotten that the mandates of his court had been contemptuously defied, and they were made while wild scenes of anarchy were sweeping away all restraint of law and order. Doubtless the judge of this court made grave mistakes; but the law allows the chancellor great latitude not only in punishing those who contemn his orders and injunctions, but in preventing the consummation of the wrong which he has judicially forbidden. Whatever may be said or thought of those matters, it was only made known to me that process of the United States court was resisted; and as said act especially provides for the use of the Army and Navy, when necessary, to enforce judicial process arising thereunder, I considered it my duty to see that such process was executed according to the judgment of the court.

Resulting from these proceedings, through various controversies and complications, a State administration was organized with William P. Kellogg as governor, which in the discharge of my duty under section 4, article 4, of the Constitution I have recognized as the government of the State.

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result. Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion has more right to it than his competitor.

On the 20th of February, 1873, the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate made a report, in which they say they were satisfied by testimony that the manipulation of the election machinery by Warmoth and others was equivalent to twenty thousand votes; and they add, to recognize the McEnery government "would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of the State." Assuming the correctness of the statements in this report, (and they seem to have been generally accepted by the country,) the great crime in Louisiana, about which so much has been said, is, that one is holding the office of governor who was cheated out of twenty thousand votes, against another whose title to the office is undoubtedly based on fraud and in defiance of the wishes and intentions of the voters of the State.

Misinformed and misjudging as to the nature and extent of this report, the supporters of McEnery proceeded to displace by force in some counties of the State the appointees of Governor Kellogg; and on the 13th of April, in an effort of that kind, a butchery of citizens was committed at Colfax, which in blood-thirstiness and barbarity is hardly surpassed by any acts of savage warfare.

To put this matter beyond controversy, I quote from the charge of Judge Woods, of the United States circuit court, to the jury in the case of the United States vs. Cruikshank and others, in New Orleans, in March, 1874. He said:

> In the case on trial there are many facts not in controversy. I proceed to state some of them in the presence and hearing of counsel on both sides; and if I state as a conceded fact any matter that is disputed, they can correct me.

After stating the origin of the difficulty, which grew out of an attempt of white persons to drive the parish judge and sheriff, appointees of Kellogg, from office, and their attempted protection by colored persons, which led to some fighting in which quite a number of negroes were killed, the judge states:

> Most of those who were not killed were taken prisoners. Fifteen or sixteen of the blacks had lifted the boards and taken refuge under the floor of the court-house. They were all captured. About thirty-seven men were taken prisoners; the number is not definitely fixed. They were kept under guard until dark. They were led out, two by two, and shot. Most of the men were shot to death. A few were wounded, not mortally, and by pretending to be dead were afterward, during the night, able to make their escape. Among them was the Levi Nelson named in the indictment.
> The dead bodies of the negroes killed in this affair were left unburied until Tuesday, April 15, when they were buried by a deputy marshal and an officer of the militia from New Orleans. These persons found fifty-nine dead bodies. They showed pistol-shot wounds, the great majority in the head, and most of them in the back of the head. In addition to the fifty-nine dead bodies found, some charred remains of dead bodies were discovered near the court-house. Six dead bodies were found under a warehouse, all shot in the head but one or two, which were shot in the breast.
> The only white men injured from the beginning of these troubles to their close were Hadnot and Harris. The court-house and its contents were entirely consumed.
> There is no evidence that any one in the crowd of whites bore any lawful warrant for the arrest of any of the blacks. There is no evidence that either Nash or Cazabat, after the affair, ever demanded their offices, to which they had set up claim, but Register continued to act as parish judge, and Shaw as sheriff.
> These are facts in this case as I understand them to be admitted.

To hold the people of Louisiana generally responsible for these atrocities would not be just; but it is a lamentable fact that insuperable obstructions were thrown in the way of punishing these murderers, and the so-called conservative papers of the State not only justified the massacre, but denounced as Federal tyranny and despotism the attempt of the United States officers to bring them to justice. Fierce denunciations ring through the country about office-holding and election matters in Louisiana, while every one of the Colfax miscreants goes unwhipped of justice, and no way can be found in this boasted land of civilization and Christianity to punish the perpetrators of this bloody and monstrous crime.

Not unlike this was the massacre in August last. Several northern young men of capital and enterprise had started the little and flourishing town of Coushatta. Some of them were republicans and office-holders under Kellogg. They were therefore doomed to death. Six of them were seized and carried away from their homes and murdered in cold blood. No one has been punished; and the conservative press of the State denounced all efforts to that end and boldly justified the crime.

Many murders of a like character have been committed in individual cases which cannot here be detailed. For example, T. S. Crawford, judge, and P. H. Harris, district attorney, of the twelfth judicial district of the State, on their way to court, were shot from their horses by men in ambush on the 8th of October, 1873, and the widow of the former in a communication to the Department of Justice, tells a piteous tale of the persecutions of her husband because he was a Union man, and of the efforts made to screen those who had committed a crime, which, to use her own language, "left two widows and nine orphans desolate."

To say that the murder of a negro or a white republican is not considered a crime in Louisiana would probably be unjust to a great part of the people; but it is true that a great number of such murders have been committed and no one has been punished therefor, and manifestly, as to them, the spirit of hatred and violence is stronger than law.

Representations were made to me that the presence of troops in Louisiana was unnecessary and irritating to the people, and that there was no danger of public disturbance if they were taken away. Consequently, early in last summer the troops were all withdrawn from the State, with the exception of a small garrison at New Orleans Barracks. It was claimed that a comparative state of quiet had supervened. Political excitement as to Louisiana affairs seemed to be dying out. But the November election was approaching, and it was necessary for party purposes that the flame should be rekindled.

Accordingly, on the 14th of September, D. P. Penn, claiming that he was elected lieutenant-governor in 1872, issued an inflammatory proclamation, calling upon the militia of the State to arm, assemble, and drive from power the usurpers, as he designated the officers of the State. The White Leagues, armed and ready for the conflict, promptly responded.

On the same day the governor made a formal requisition upon me, pursuant to the act of 1795 and section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, to aid in suppressing domestic violence. On the next day I issued my proclamation, commanding the insurgents to disperse within five days from the date thereof; but before the proclamation was published in New Orleans the organized and armed forces, recognizing a usurping governor, had taken forcible possession of the State-house and temporarily subverted the government. Twenty or more people were killed, including a number of the police of the city. The streets of the city were stained with blood. All that was desired in the way of excitement had been accomplished, and, in view of the steps taken to repress it, the revolution is apparently, though it is believed not really, abandoned, and the cry of Federal usurpation and tyranny in Louisiana was renewed with redoubled energy. Troops had been sent to the State under this requisition of the governor, and as other disturbances seemed imminent, they were allowed to remain there to render the executive such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State and repress the continued violence which seemed inevitable the moment Federal support should be withdrawn.

Prior to, and with a view to the late election in Louisiana, white men associated themselves together in armed bodies called "White Leagues," and at the same time threats were made in the democratic journals of the State that the election should be carried against the republicans at all hazards, which very naturally greatly alarmed the colored voters. By section 8 of the act of February 28, 1871, it is made the duty of United States marshals and their deputies, at polls where votes are cast for Representatives in Congress, to keep the peace and prevent any violations of the so-called enforcement acts, and other offenses against the laws of the United States; and upon a requisition of the marshal of Louisiana, and in view of said armed organizations and other portentous circumstances, I caused detachments of troops to be stationed in various localities in the State to aid him in the performance of his official duties. That there was intimidation of republican voters at the election, notwithstanding these precautions, admits of no doubt. The following are specimens of the means used:

On the 14th of October eighty persons signed and published the following at Shreveport:

> We, the undersigned, merchants of the city of Shreveport, in obedience to a request of the Shreveport campaign club, agree to use every endeavor to get our employés to vote the people's ticket at the ensuing election; and in the event of their refusal so to do, or in case they vote the radical ticket, to refuse to employ them at the expiration of their present contracts.

On the same day another large body of persons published in the same place a paper, in which they used the following language:

> We, the undersigned, merchants of the city of Shreveport, alive to the great importance of securing good and honest government to the State, do agree and pledge ourselves not to advance any supplies or money to any planter the coming year who will give employment or rent lands to laborers who vote the radical ticket in the coming election.

I have no information of the proceedings of the returning board for said election which may not be found in its report, which has been published, but it is a matter of public information that a great part of the time taken to canvass the votes was consumed by the arguments of lawyers, several of whom represented each party before the board. I have no evidence that the proceedings of this board were not in accordance with the law under which they acted. Whether in excluding from their count certain returns they were right or wrong, is a question that depends upon the evidence they had before them; but it is very clear that the law gives them the power, if they choose to exercise it, of deciding that way; and prima facie the persons whom they return as elected are entitled to the offices for which they were candidates.

Respecting the alleged interference by the military with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th instant, I have no knowledge or information which has not been received by me since that time and published. My first information was from the papers of the morning of the 5th of January. I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence. I am well aware that any military interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of the State Legislature or any of its proceedings, or with any civil department of the Government, is repugnant to our ideas of government I can conceive of no case, not involving rebellion or insurrection, where such interference by authority of the General Government ought to be permitted or can be justified. But there are circumstances connected with the late legislative imbroglio in Louisiana which seem to exempt the military from any intentional wrong in that matter. Knowing that they had been placed in Louisiana to prevent domestic violence and aid in the enforcement of the State laws, the officers and troops of the United States may well have supposed that it was their duty to act when called upon by the governor for that purpose.

Each branch of a legislative assembly is the judge of the election and qualifications of its own members. But if a mob or a body of unauthorized persons seize and hold the legislative hall in a tumultuous and riotous manner, and so prevent any organization by those legally returned as elected, it might become the duty of the State executive to interpose, if requested by a majority of the members-elect, to suppress the disturbance and enable the persons elected to organize the house.

Any exercise of this power would only be justifiable under most extraordinary circumstances, and it would then be the duty of the governor to call upon the constabulary or, if necessary, the military force of the State. But with reference to Louisiana, it is to be borne in mind that any attempt by the governor to use the police force of that State at this time would have undoubtedly precipitated a bloody conflict with the White League, as it did on the 14th of September.

There is no doubt but that the presence of the United States troops upon that occasion prevented bloodshed and the loss of life. Both parties appear to have relied upon them as conservators of the public peace.

The first call was made by the democrats to remove persons obnoxious to them from the legislative hall; and the second was from the republicans to remove persons who had usurped seats in the Legislature without legal certificates entitling them to seats, and in sufficient number to change the majority.

Nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature. That the democratic minority of the house undertook to seize its organization by fraud and violence; that in this attempt they trampled under foot law; that they undertook to make persons not returned as elected members, so as to create a majority; that they acted under a preconcerted plan, and under false pretenses introduced into the hall a body of men to support their pretensions by force, if necessary, and that conflict, disorder, and riotous proceedings followed, are facts that seem to be well established; and I am credibly informed that these violent proceedings were a part of a premeditated plan to have the house organized in this way, recognize what has been called the McEnery senate, then to depose Governor Kellogg, and so revolutionize the State government.

Whether it was wrong for the governor, at the request of the majority of the members returned as elected to the house, to use such means as were in his power to defeat these lawless and revolutionary proceedings is perhaps a debatable question, but it is quite certain that there would have been no trouble if those who now complain of illegal interference had allowed the house to be organized in a lawful and regular manner. When those who inaugurate disorder and anarchy disavow such proceedings, it will be time enough to condemn those who, by such means as they have, prevent the success of their lawless and desperate schemes.

Lieutenant-General Sheridan was requested by me to go to Louisiana to observe and report the situation there, and, if in his opinion necessary, to assume the command, which he did on the 4th instant, after the legislative disturbances had occurred, at 9 o'clock p. m., a number of hours after the disturbances. No party motives nor prejudices can reasonably be imputed to him; but, honestly convinced by what he has seen and heard there, he has characterized the leaders of the White Leagues in severe terms, and suggested summary modes of procedure against them, which, though they cannot be adopted, would, if legal, soon put an end to the troubles and disorders in that State. General Sheridan was looking at facts, and possibly, not thinking of proceedings which would be the only proper ones to pursue in time of peace, thought more of the utterly lawless condition of society surrounding him at the time of his dispatch and of what would prove a sure remedy. He never proposed to do an illegal act, nor expressed determination to proceed beyond what the law in the future might authorize for the punishment of the atrocities which have been committed, and the commission of which cannot be successfully denied. It is a deplorable fact that political crimes and murders have been committed in Louisiana, which have gone unpunished and which have been justified or apologized for, which must rest as a reproach upon the State and country long after the present generation has passed away.

I have no desire to have United States troops interfere in the domestic concerns of Louisiana or any other State.

On the 9th of December last Governor Kellogg telegraphed to me his apprehensions that the White League intended to make another attack upon the State-house, to which, on the same day, I made the following answer, since which no communication has been sent to him:

> Your dispatch of this date just received. It is exceedingly unpalatable to use troops in anticipation of danger. Let the State authorities be right, and then proceed with their duties without apprehension of danger. If they are then molested, the question will be determined whether the United States is able to maintain law and order within its limits or not.

I have deplored the necessity which seemed to make it my duty under the Constitution and laws to direct such interference. I have always refused except where it seemed to be my imperative duty to act in such a manner under the Constitution and laws of the United States. I have repeatedly and earnestly entreated the people of the South to live together in peace, and obey the laws; and nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see reconciliation and tranquillity everywhere prevail, and thereby remove all necessity for the presence of troops among them. I regret, however, to say that this state of things does not exist, nor does its existence seem to be desired in some localities; and as to those it may be proper for me to say that, to the extent that Congress has conferred power upon me to prevent it, neither Ku-Klux-Klans, White Leagues, nor any other association using arms and violence to execute their unlawful purposes, can be permitted in that way to govern any part of this country; nor can I see with indifference Union men or republicans ostracised, persecuted, and murdered on account of their opinions, as they now are in some localities.

I have heretofore urged the case of Louisiana upon the attention of Congress, and I cannot but think that its inaction has produced great evil.

To summarize: In September last an armed, organized body of men, in the support of candidates who had been put in nomination for the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, at the November election, in 1872, and who had been declared not elected by the board of canvassers, recognized by all the courts to which the question had been submitted, undertook to subvert and overthrow the State government that had been recognized by me, in accordance with previous precedents. The recognized governor was driven from the State-house, and, but for his finding shelter in the United States custom-house, in the capital of the State of which he was governor, it is scarcely to be doubted that he would have been killed.

From the State-house, before he had been driven to the custom-house, a call was made, in accordance with the fourth section, fourth article, of the Constitution of the United States, for the aid of the General Government to suppress domestic violence. Under those circumstances, and in accordance with my sworn duties, my proclamation of the 15th of September, 1874, was issued. This served to reinstate Governor Kellogg to his position nominally; but it cannot be claimed that the insurgents have, to this day, surrendered to the State authorities the arms belonging to the State, or that they have in any sense disarmed. On the contrary, it is known that the same armed organization that existed on the 14th of September, 1874, in opposition to the recognized State government still retain their organization, equipments, and commanders, and can be called out at any hour to resist the State government. Under these circumstances, the same military force has been continued in Louisiana as was sent there under the first call and under the same general instructions. I repeat, that the task assumed by the troops is not a pleasant one to them; that the Army is not composed of lawyers capable of judging at a moment's notice of just how far they can go in the maintenance of law and order, and that it was impossible to give specific instructions providing for all possible contingencies that might arise. The troops were bound to act upon the judgment of the commanding officer upon each sudden contingency that arose or wait instructions, which could only reach them after the threatened wrongs had been committed which they were called on to prevent. It should be recollected, too, that upon my recognition of the Kellogg government I reported the fact, with the grounds of recognition, to Congress, and asked that body to take action in the matter; otherwise, I should regard their silence as an acquiescence in my course. No action has been taken by that body, and I have maintained the position then marked out.

If error has been committed by the Army in these matters, it has always been on the side of the preservation of good order, the maintenance of law, and the protection of life. Their bearing reflects credit upon the soldiers; and if wrong has resulted, the blame is with the turbulent element surrounding them.

I now earnestly ask that such action be taken by Congress as to leave my duties perfectly clear in dealing with the affairs of Louisiana, giving assurance at the same time that whatever may be done by that body in the premises will be executed according to the spirit and letter of the law, without fear or favor.

I herewith transmit copies of documents containing more specific information as to the subject-matter of the resolution.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 13, 1875.

ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, August 19, 1874.

SIR: I regret to have to trouble you again about our affairs, but the exceptional circumstances surrounding us, and the importance of the issues involved, render it necessary that I should make a brief statement of the situation.

Louisiana is now the last State in the southwest, except Mississippi, that remains true to the republican party. We have a large majority of the legal voters of the State. Even our opponents now admit it, and, refuting their own often-repeated assertions of last year, that a heavy colored vote was polled for the fusion candidates, assert in their published call that all efforts to persuade the colored element to unite with them have failed, and consequently that other means must be resorted to. Accordingly they have abandoned the policy of fraud, upon which they relied in 1872, and have returned to the policy of murder, violence, and intimidation which they pursued in 1868 to such purpose, that out of nearly eight thousand republican votes in the State barely six thousand votes were cast for yourself and the national republican ticket.

The great majority of the republican voters of this State are colored, though we are daily receiving large accessions of white voters, especially in the city of New Orleans, where we shall probably poll from four to five thousand more white votes than at the last election. In the river parishes, which are easily accessible, and where our numerical superiority is very great, we shall probably be able to proserve peace and bring out our full vote in the coming election without much trouble; but in the more distant parishes of the State, lying on the borders of Arkansas and Texas, where turbulence and lawlessness are chronic, much violence already prevails and much more is anticipated before election.

The State is doing and will do all it can to suppress these internal disorders, but there are influences of a very powerful kind which are being used against us. The eminently just and proper action of the National Administration in the affairs of Arkansas and Texas is represented as indicating a settled purpose on the part of yourself to "let the South alone," and not to extend to any republican government in the Southern States the protection of the General Government, no matter what domestic violence may be set afoot. This impression has been industriously circulated in the parishes lying near the Arkansas and Texas line, and, taken in connection with the decision of Judge Bradley releasing the Grant Parish murders, has had a very bad effect. At the same time, while this impression is being circulated with regard to the attitude of the President, the pronounced hostility of these men to the National Government remains as bitter as ever.

By the redistribution of districts this State is entitled to representation by six Congressmen in the next Congress. In five at least out of the six districts we have an undoubted republican majority, and we can elect our candidates if we can have a fair election, uncontrolled by violence. I have felt it due alike to the National Administration and to the State government that the coming election should be held clear of all auspicions of fraud such as have tainted previous elections in Louisiana. Accordingly I have approved and promulgated an act passed by the last Legislature providing for an entirely new registration throughout the State. I have voluntarily pledged myself to give the opposition a clerk in every registration office in the State, and our new law gives them a commissioner at every poll. So far as the State administration is concerned, the next election will be one of the fairest ever held in Louisiana.

But it is necessary that every republican voter should know that he will be protected if violently interfered with in the exercise of the rights conferred upon him by Congress and the Constitution, and should feel that he is not beyond the reach of the national arm. Except a handful of men at Colfax, we have no United States troops in the State, and have had none since the Nineteenth Infantry were removed, which is now several months since. There are troops now stationed at Holly Springs, Mississippi, who I believe are designed for service in this State. If they were promptly assigned to the respective stations heretofore occupied by the Nineteenth Infantry, whom they have been sent to relieve, one great incentive to the outrages and violence now prevailing would be at once removed.

The heated term here has apparently passed, and the State is healthier than it has been for many years. Not a single case of yellow fever has anywhere manifested itself, nor is there any epidemic disease prevailing. I respectfully and earnestly suggest that if the United States troops were returned to their posts in this State, such a course would have a most salutary effect, and would prevent much bloodshed, and probably a formal call upon the President and a renewed agitation of the Louisiana question, which otherwise a quiet, fair election next November would forever set at rest, and fully vindicate your just policy toward us.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. P. KELLOGG.

His Excellency PRESIDENT GRANT,
Long Branch.

Attorney-General WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

The registration of voters throughout the State for election of Congressmen commences to-morrow in several parishes. Large bodies of armed and mounted white men have appeared. Through fear of them the blacks will be unable to register or vote in case of a conflict, which I regard as imminent. I shall be unable to enforce the laws of Congress without a posse of troops. It is believed the mere presence of United States troops in this district will prevent interference with the blacks in their registration. I therefore request, through the Attorney-General, that the Secretary of War order a sufficient force to this district immediately to aid in the discharge of my duty as required by law.

NEW ORLEANS, August 30, 1874.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington:

A gross outrage has just been perpetrated at Coushatta, Red River Parish, in the northwestern portion of the State. A large number of white-leaguers from that and other parishes near the Texas and Arkansas line invaded the parish, in order to force the parish officers to resign. They refused; but after a short conflict, in which several persons were killed, to avoid further bloodshed these officers and other leading republicans surrendered. Red River Parish, a new parish formed some four years since, is strongly republican, there being three colored to one white. It was returned as largely republican by the fusionists at last election. Coushatta, though small, is the most thriving landing on Upper Red River, and is owned mainly by northern men. It is known, however, as one of the strongholds of republicanism in that portion of the State; the people pay taxes, are industrious, and law abiding. A more wanton outrage was never committed in any civilized community, as an investigation will fully show. The white-leaguers, in order to carry out more effectually their avowed plan of carrying the State by terrifying republicans and preventing their registering and voting, as was done in 1868, have inaugurated violence in several of the northern parishes. There are no troops in that portion of the State, and indeed none in the State except a company at Colfax. As the evident intention of the White League is to inaugurate domestic violence and interference with the rights of the colored citizens, especially in the remote parishes where our State militia cannot be sent, and as the registration of voters throughout the State commences to-morrow, I respectfully suggest that the troops now in Mississippi, designed, I believe, to take the place of the Nineteenth Infantry ordered away in July, be directed to resume the posts vacated by said regiment. A systematic effort has been and is being made by the opposition to create the impression that no troops will under any circumstances be sent into the State. The presence of troops, it is believed, will go far to prevent violence and bloodshed. No danger need be apprehended on sanitary grounds, as both city and State are perfectly healthy, not the slightest sign of epidemic disease existing or likely to occur this season.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General United States, Washington, D. C.:

The statement telegraphed you last night, regarding the outrage at Red River Parish, has been fully confirmed. Further information has just been received that the parish officers and others who surrendered to the White League were being taken to Shreveport by a number of white men. En route they were all shot in cold blood. Among the murdered men were Homer J. Twitchell, who came South in a Vermont regiment during the war and settled as a planter in Red River Parish; Eggleston, sheriff; Dewees, supervisor; and Halland and Howells, lawyers. There were six white republicans, all but two northern men, and several colored, murdered in this affair. Red River Parish is near the Texas line, and is among the strongest republican parishes in the State. Predatory bands of armed men are scouting several of the republican parishes in that portion of the State, driving out republicans and intimidating colored men. Registration commenced to-day, and an openly-avowed policy of exterminating the republicans.

A meeting of about two thousand has been held, and a committee sent demanding the governor's immediate resignation. The committee was received by assistant attorney-general, also a member of the governor's staff, and by direction of the governor informed the committee that the governor refused to receive any communication from a body of armed men accompanied with a menace. The people assembled at the meeting were generally unarmed, but large bodies of white-leaguers are under arms in the vicinity awaiting orders. The meeting dismissed, and the people notified to come to Canal street to-night at four o'clock, with their arms and blankets, and camp there. Mr. Marr, chairman democratic committee, was chairman of the committee to demand the governor's resignation. There is little doubt of a conflict to-night. I have a company of United States troops guarding the custom-house building, that arrived, on my requisition, from Jackson, Mississippi, this morning. Four companies are en route from Holly Springs, expected at four o'clock, if not intercepted as threatened. The armed gathering to-night is avowedly to attempt the overthrow of the State government; if successful, the murder of leading republicans. The local authorities have several hundred men under arms at State-house and arsenals. The State authorities are exercising the utmost discretion, in order that if blood be shed, it will be precipitated by the White League.

NEW ORLEANS, November 1, 1874.

Extract from letter of Deputy Marshal Stockton, dated Natchitoches, October 22, 1874:

"There should be a company of infantry here now, and remain all winter. These people swear as soon as I go away with the cavalry they intend to kill all the prominent white and black republicans in the parish. It is rumored to-day that at the meeting of the White League last night, which was addressed by Levy and Moncure, only seventy-five present, twelve prominent republicans were selected to be killed as soon as the cavalry left here; among whom are Bolt and sons, Pierson, Blunt, Breda, &c. Moncure urged them to make it too hot for them to live here, &c. These peaceable citizens marched to the hall under military commands. The greatest reign of terror and intimidation all over the town, of three thousand inhabitants, and the parish. Both Lieutenants McIntosh and Wallace say there is more and greater disloyalty here openly avowed than they ever knew in any other part of the United States; and the moment we leave here they believe a large number will be killed, because these white-leaguers say the leading republicans here have been at the bottom of these arrests. You cannot imagine the state of affairs here. If the President intends to make good the assertion that any citizen shall be as safe in any part of Louisiana as in Massachusetts, he will have to order a company of troops to remain here permanently. I see and feel that our operations here, which for the time have upset all the calculations of the white-leaguers, will only add increased revenge when we retire. It is a sad state of affairs, and can only be corrected by the military arm of the Government, and that arm must have positive instructions to render immediate aid, or be commanded by an officer like Lieutenant McIntosh, who comprehends the situation, perceives the effect, and knows how to remove the cause."

I have the honor, therefore, to request you to direct that a post be established at Natchitoches, and that General Emory be ordered to place a company of troops there.

President GRANT,
Washington, D. C.:

I transmit the following dispatch by request of Ex-Governor Wells, president of the returning board.

WM. P. KELLOGG.

NEW ORLEANS, December 10, 1874.

President GRANT:

Authentic information in possession of the returning board justifies them in believing that an attack is intended upon the Saint Louis Hotel, now occupied as a State-house, wherein the returning board holds its sessions, and where the returns of the late elections are deposited. The board has nearly completed a careful and impartial canvass of the returns, in compliance with law, and expect to make promulgations therefrom as soon as the same can be properly compiled. The members of the board are being publicly and privately threatened with violence, and an attack upon the State-house, which is likely to result in bloodshed, is also threatened. By request of the board, I respectfully ask that a detachment of troops be stationed in the State-house, so that the deliberations and final action of the board may be free from intimidation and violence.

J. MADISON WELLS,
President of State Returning Board.

SHREVEPORT, LOUISIANA, December 16, 1874.

DEAR SIR: My position as United States commissioner for this locality has made me somewhat intimately acquainted with the condition of affairs in North Louisiana, which I think you ought to be informed of. This is my apology for troubling you with this communication.

You are already informed of the general character of the late political canvass in this State, as conducted by the whites, and of the results. Without attempting to define the precise modus operandi of the white man's party here, it is scarcely too much to say that the white voters of each parish north of Red River constituted an armed conspiracy, with the scarcely disguised purpose of carrying the election at all events—by threats, intimidation, and fraud if possible, and by violence if necessary, all of which, first and last, were used freely.

The scheme here was to expel from the country the republican leaders, and then to frighten the negroes into acquiescence with their wishes; and this scheme was pursued to the end with this modification, that after the arrival of troops the expelled leaders returned, but did not dare to go out of Shreveport, and did not dare to mingle freely with the people or to express publicly their sentiments.

The whites in all this portion of the State were united upon this programme almost to a man. This unanimity did not result all from choice, but so formidable had the organization become by August, that even those who disapproved no longer dared to resist, even passively, and took shelter in the white party.

The blacks are numerically far superior to the whites in all this part of the State, nearly 2½ to 1, at any rate more than an average of 2 to 1; yet, when you consider the ignorance and dependence of these blacks and their consequent timidity, and that the leaders—white and black—were either banished or silenced, it will not be difficult for you to comprehend how the white minority dominated so completely the colored majority and carried out their programme. The blacks, unorganized and unadvised, were quietly and peaceably pursuing their labor, cultivating the crops, while the whites, who habitually, to a greater or less extent, cheat them of the rewards of their labor, were banding themselves together to defraud them of their right of suffrage also.

The Coushatta affair, occurring in the last days of July, and in the guilt of which we believe from our present knowledge not less than two hundred whites participated more or less proximately, seemed to serve them as an incentive to closer union and more rigorous action. A very large number, scattered up and down the river from Shreveport to Natchitoches, seeking immunity from their guilt in the destruction of all law and public order, redoubled their efforts to terrorize the blacks and to annihilate all opposition.

Perhaps I cannot give you in a few words a better idea of the ascendant arrogance and intolerance of the white leaders than to say that the Shreveport Times newspaper—the leading exponent of the principles of the party in the State—boldly and unqualifiedly justified the Coushatta assassination on the sole ground of political necessity.

The orators of the party did substantially the same thing during the canvass, and the less prudent speak of it to this day as a good thing. Even Governor McEnery, in a speech to this place, as I am well informed, openly advocated the lynching of one of the republican leaders residing here, and a man of good character.

The republican meetings during the canvass were composed mostly of blacks, generally not more than three to five or six white republicans. There were always present enough turbulent whites to overawe the meeting, and frequently to break it up. At these meetings the whites did not hesitate to threaten the blacks with condign punishment if they presisted in voting the republican ticket.

Among the milder forms of intimidation resorted to were such announcements as the following:

"We, the undersigned, merchants and business men of Shreveport, in obedience to a request of the Shreveport campaign club, agree to use every endeavor to get our employés to vote the people's ticket at the ensuing election, and in the event of their refusal so to do, or in case they vote the radical ticket, to refuse to employ them at the expiration of their present contracts."

I inclose a short editorial on one of these cards, taken from the Shreveport Times of the 23d of October.

It would be tedious to attempt to fill up this general outline. If your imagination supplies for details not only a general apprehension of material consequences—loss of their present crops, loss of employment, disruption of their heretofore friendly relations with the whites, the proprietors of the soil—but an absolute and constant fear of personal danger, especially to all such as were supposed to have any prominence or influence among their fellows as political leaders, this fear frequently strengthened and even intensified by the actual experience of personal violence, you will not have an exaggerated idea of what was the real condition of the colored people here at the time of election.

It is humiliating in the extreme to contemplate the condition of the freedmen in Louisiana, in the light of American citizens, under the protection of a great and benevolent Government. Emboldened by the prospective success of the infamous scheme of the election, the whites are now driving the freedmen from their homes, naked and penniless, to endure the severities of winter as best they may. This very evening and since I commenced this letter, a colored man, of honest and intelligent expression, comes in and tells me that last night, about nine o'clock, his employer, a white man, (well known to me,) by force (displaying a pistol and threatening to use it) put him and his wife and three helpless children out of their house to spend the night, as best they might, in the public highway, which they did under the open canopy of heaven; and what may be put down as a special aggravation of the offense is that two of the children were ill and taking medicine, and one of them was so ill that it was not expected to survive. These people (turned out) were partners in the crop which they had raised on the lands of the man who turned them out, and the crop had not yet been divided and is all in the possession of the landowner who turned them out. This man had voted the republican ticket at the late election.

This is only one case in many coming to my knowledge daily. A few days ago complaint was made before me against seven white men in the adjoining parish of De Soto, charging them with conspiring to plunder, rob, and murder one poor defenseless old negro by the name of John Allston, and an extensive and full inquiry into the matter revealed the fact that the charge was well laid, for they in fact not only plundered him and his family, but murdered the old man outright. Four of these are now under bond for their appearance, and the rest have fled.

These people are systematically intimidated, browbeaten, personally maltreated, cheated of their earnings, cheated of their suffrage, driven from their homes in penury to endure the inclemency of winter, and cheated of their rights to vindicate themselves before the courts. In simple truth, they no longer have any rights which the whites voluntarily respect, or which they have themselves the means or ability to make them respect. To submit their claims for adjustment to the mixed juries of our local courts, where the influence of the whites is wholly predominant, would be the veriest farce conceivable, and the attorney, if one could be found at all, would have to become answerable for court costs and work for nothing, all at the peril of his professional standing.

So numerous and wholesale are the offenses of the whites against these defenseless creatures that I almost hesitate to name approximately the number of persons subject to arrest and punishment for aggravated violation of the enforcement and Ku-Klux acts, within fifty miles of this place. To be entirely safe, I will put it at two hundred and fifty. What is the relief for this state of things? It seems clear to us that the only glimmer of hope for the freedmen is in a vigorous enforcement of the Federal laws, and that speedily; and when we contemplate this resource, and measure the capacity of the courts, as now established by the enormous amount of business to be transacted, it becomes at once obvious that the facilities for the administration of the laws of Congress in Louisiana are entirely inadequate.

As now established, the Federal courts sit in this district only in New Orleans—seven hundred miles away from here by the nearest and speediest mode of travel. Considering that what has been said above of the condition of two or three parishes adjacent to Shreveport is true to a greater or less degree of every parish in the State, how would it be possible for any single court to answer the demands of this exigency? Besides, if the courts sitting in New Orleans had time to transact the business in full, the expense and general impracticability of sending witnesses so far before the grand jury and then to attend the final trial, will, to my mind, be such as itself to defeat substantially every attempt to bring these violators of the law to justice, and they will thus go unpunished.

My object in writing this letter has been and is not only to give you a reliable statement of our condition here generally, but specially to enable you to see the importance of increased facilities in the way of administering the law in this section, and to invoke the exercise of your influence for the establishment of a United States district court for North Louisiana. This, in my opinion, is an immediate and imperative necessity; without it the authority of the Federal laws will be scarcely known or heard of, and certainly not feared or respected, in North Louisiana.

I have been a resident of Shreveport nearly twenty years and of the South since the year 1847.

I have further to add, that I have had the honor to read this letter to General Lewis Merrill commanding this division, and he authorizes me to say that he fully indorses every statement and suggestion contained in it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

A. B. LEVISA.

Hon. G. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 24, 1874.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Chicago, Illinois:

GENERAL: The President sent for me this morning, and desires me to say to you that he wishes you to visit the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and especially New Orleans, in Louisiana, and Vicksburgh and Jackson, in Mississippi, and ascertain for yourself and for his information the general condition of matters in those localities. You need not confine your visit to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and may extend your trip to other States, Alabama, &c., if you see proper; nor need you confine your visit in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to the places named. What the President desires is to ascertain the true condition of affairs, and to receive such suggestions from you as you may deem advisable and judicious.

Inclosed herewith is an order authorizing you to assume command of the Military Division of the South, or of any portion of that division, should you see proper to do so. It may be possible that circumstances may arise which would render this a proper course to pursue. You can, if you desire it, see General McDowell in Louisville, and make known to him confidentially the object of your trip; but this is not required of you. Communication with him by you is left entirely to your own judgment.

Of course you can take with you such gentlemen of your staff as you wish, and it is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business, for the fact of your mere presence in the localities referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect.

The President thinks, and so do I, that a trip South might be agreeable to you, and that you might be able to obtain a good deal of information on the subject about which we desire to learn. You can make your return by Washington and make a verbal report, and also inform me from time to time of your views and conclusions.

Yours, truly, &c.,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT-GENARAL'S OFFICE,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
New Orleans, January 4, 1875.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to inform you that the house of representatives of this State was organized to-day by the election of myself as speaker, fifty eight members, two more than a quorum voting, with a full house present. More than two hours after the organization I was informed by the officer in command of the United States troops in this city that he had been requested by Governor Kellogg to remove certain members of the house from the State-house, and that, under his orders, he was obliged to comply with the request. I protested against any interference of the United States with the organization or proceedings of the house, but, notwithstanding this, the officer in command marched a company of soldiers upon the floor of the house, and by force removed thirteen members, who had been legally and constitutionally seated as such, and who, at time of such forcible removal, were participating in the proceedings of the house. In addition to this, the military declared their purpose to further interfere with force in the business and organization of this Assembly, upon which some fifty-two members and the speaker withdrew, declining to participate any longer in the business of the house under the dictation of the military. As speaker, I respectfully appeal to you to know by what authority and under what law the United States Army interrupted and broke up a session of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, and to urgently request and demand that they be ordered to restore the house to the position it occupied when they so interfered, and, further, that they be instructed that it is no part of their duty to interfere in any manner with the internal workings of the General Assembly. The house is the representation of the sovereignty of the State, and I know of no law which warrants either the executive of the State or the United States Army to interfere with its organization or proceedings.

Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana.

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people, all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

[General Order No. 1.—9 p. m.]

Under instructions from the President of the United States, communicated through the Adjutant-General of the Army, the undersigned hereby assumes control of the Department of the Gulf, consisting of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi and the Gulf posts as far eastward as and embracing Fort Jefferson and Key West, Florida, including the forts in Mobile Bay, which will hereafter constitute one of the departments of the Military Division of the Missouri.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, United States Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 5, 1875.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
United States Army, Saint Louis, Missouri:

The Secretary of War directs me to inform you Lieutenant-General Sheridan has annexed Department of the Gulf to his division, under authority given him by the President December 24, 1874.

The measure is deemed necessary and is approved.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington:

Your telegram of 5th instant, stating that General Sheridan has annexed Department of Gulf to his command, &c., has been received.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

[Telegram dated New Orleans, January 5, 1875. Received at N. E. corner Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue 4.47 p. m.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Please say to the President that he need give himself no uneasiness about the condition of affairs here. I will preserve the peace, which it is not hard to do with the naval and military forces in and about the city; and if Congress will declare the White Leagues and other similar organizations, white or black, banditti, I will relieve it from the necessity of any special legislation for the preservation of peace and equality of rights in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the Executive from much of the trouble heretofore had in this section of the country.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

[Telegram dated Headquarters Military Division of the Missouri, New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875. Received January 5.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I telegraph the following letter from General Merrill for the information of the War Department.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT UPPER RED RIVER,
Shreveport, Louisiana, December 30, 1874.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

SIR: Referring to your telegram of December 17, directing me, in certain events, to be in readiness to suppress violence, and let it be understood that I will do it, I have the honor to report that, in view of these instructions, I have been at some pains to investigate the probabilities of violence here, and find the following to be the facts as nearly as I can ascertain them: The State returning board have officially announced that the candidates for office in this parish, on what is known as the radical ticket, are duly and lawfully elected; the leaders of the opposing party declare that such is not the fact, and that the persons then declared elected shall not take or hold the offices; this determination appears to be well settled and so generally expressed and approved by the large majority of the whites that I have no doubt it is more than an idle threat; this expression, in many instances, is accompanied by threats of violence and even death to the officers if they attempt to take the offices, and I cannot doubt that such threats are very seriously made; they are only a repetition of what was at all times the open talk of all the leaders before the election. Three of the officers referred to are members of the lower house of the State Legislature, and all three are now in New Orleans. The others are the parish judge, Creswell, the sheriff, Kefner, and several minor officers, including police, jury, justices of the peace, and constables. These are here. There is on the part of most of them such apprehension of danger in assuming their duties that, except the parish judge, I do not think any one of them will attempt or could be induced to take his office. The parish judge is a man of courage and coolness, and I cannot tell whether he will attempt to take his office or not. I have not seen him recently, and have no definite information of his purpose. So long as any or all of these officers refuse to exercise the functions of their office, I conceive I am not called upon to do anything in the matter. In one case where my advice was sought as to whether the office should be claimed, I distinctly and peremptorily refused to give any advice, saying that this was no part of my duty, and that these individuals must determine such question for themselves. It is, I think, pretty well understood that my instructions cover the following points and will be carried out: That I organize as the legal State officials only such persons as are recognized as such by the recognized executive or judicial officers of the State. That in the legal exercise of their official duties such officers must not be violently disturbed or interfered with, and if such violence occurs it is my duty to suppress it, and that I will do so. That my advice to all persons is, that if any question exists of the right of any person to hold any office, that such questions shall be taken before the proper legal tribunals for determination, and shall be peaceably determined by the means fixed by law for that purpose. That beyond this I have nothing to say and no advice to any one.

Whether any violence which will render military interference necessary shall occur, depends upon so many contingencies that I am not prepared to give any opinion except to say that if these officers attempt to take their office, I have no doubt whatever that it will be necessary to protect them. The three who have gone to New Orleans to take their seats as members of the Legislature, beyond doubt could not safely return here now. Outside of the officers named above, there is no one left here to do violence upon. The leading radicals have left. The usual worrying and harassing of the negroes goes on with little intermission, but lately no acts of violence to person have come to my knowledge; such acts now are confined to plundering them, with or without some show of legal forms, and driving them from their homes to seek places to live elsewhere. The conflict for the offices, whether conducted by peaceable legal means or by violence, will stop what little legal check now exists upon crime and wrong-doing, and will greatly aggravate the condition of things, which is already serious enough, but I do not apprehend that it will result in extended disorder at present, because there is nothing left to work upon except the commoner orders, and partly because the leading white-leaguers have gone to New Orleans.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEWIS MERRILL,
Major Seventh Cavalry, Commanding District.

[Telegram received in cipher January 6, 1875, from Lieutenant-General P. H. Sheridan; dated New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War:

There is some excitement in the rotunda of the Saint Charles Hotel to-night upon the publication by the newspapers of my dispatch to you calling the secret armed organization banditti. Give yourself no uneasiness. I see my way clear enough if you will only have confidence.

I telegraphed you hastily to-day, answering your dispatch. You seem to fear that we had been misled by biased or partial statements of your acts. Be assured that the President and Cabinet confide in your wisdom, and rest in the belief that all acts of yours have been and will be judicious. This I intended to say in my brief telegram.

Gen. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

The city is very quiet to-day. Some of the banditti made idle threats last night that they would assassinate me because I dared to tell the truth. I am not afraid, and will not be stopped from informing the Government that there are localities in this department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for several years.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General Commanding.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Several prominent people have for the last few days been passing resolutions and manufacturing sensational protests for northern political consumption. They seem to be trying to make martyrs of themselves; it cannot be done at this late day; there have been too many bleeding negroes and ostracized white citizens for their statements to be believed by fair-minded people. Bishop Wilmer protests against my telegram of the 4th instant, forgetting that on Saturday last he testified under oath before the congressional committee that the condition of affairs here was substantially as bad as reported by me. I will soon send you a statement of the number of murders committed in this State during the last three or four years, the perpetrators of which are still unpunished. I think that the number will startle you; it will be up in the thousands. The city is perfectly quiet. No trouble is apprehended.

Lieutenant-General U. S. A.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, January 7, 1875.

Gen. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington:

The following illustrates the action of the banditti in this State in kidnaping a member-elect of the Legislature.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

About ten o'clock Thursday morning A. J. Cousin and his father arrived in this city from Covington, Saint Tammany Parish. His statement is as follows: I was standing near the old basin, corner of Carondelet walk and Claiborne street, between eight and nine o'clock on Saturday morning, when I saw two men coming toward me, who told me I was their prisoner. I asked them what for. They told me to walk with them and they would tell me. One of them was Jim Poole, a merchant of Covington; the other man was a stranger to me. I asked them to let me go and tell Mr. Juno, a brick merchant on the basin, that I was arrested, so that he could inform my family, which they refused, saying they did not want me to speak to or see any one. From there they walked me straight to the parish prison and delivered me over to Captain Floyd Flood, or some name like that, and the captain put me in the prison and had me locked up about ten minutes, when he called me and had me handcuffed by the order of Poole; they then put me in a carriage, and Poole and three strange men took me to the lake end, where we arrived about noon; a few minutes after we arrived there Mr. Poole took my handcuffs off and sent the carriage back. They kept me there all day between the lake and the old basin until about four o'clock in the afternoon, when they put me in the hold of the boat called the Camelia. They told me the reason they put me there was that they did not want me to see or speak to anybody. I was kept inside the hold till the boat left the wharf. The gentlemen who arrested me told me that if ten policemen came to take me away from them they could not, as they were armed and would fight them if necessary. After the boat left the wharf I was allowed to come on deck. While on the boat I was treated well, was given something to eat, and asked to take a drink and a cigar. Budd Hosmer, of Saint Tammany, I recognized among the men on the boat who had charge of me when the boat arrived at Mandeville.

I was taken charge of by about fifteen or twenty men, armed with muskets and fixed bayonets; most of them I knew. They told me not to be afraid, as they were not going to hurt me.

Mr. Ben Hosmer and another gentleman took me in a carriage with two other gentlemen, when I was driven to Covington, the armed men following behind us on horseback to Covington, ten miles from Mandeville, where we arrived between eight and nine at night. The lieutenant of the company, Charley Bradley, told me that if I would not try to run away they would not hurt me. I was at first kept in a room at Mr. Thomas Lacroix's house until Sunday afternoon at four o'clock, when they took me under guard to the court-house of Covington. They treated me well and took me out with them, but would not allow me to see or talk with any of my friends for twenty-four hours. After refusing my father four times this request, they at last allowed him to see me. At noon on Monday two men took me into the country, nine miles from Covington. The men were armed with revolvers. They said if any one attempted to take me away from them they would fight or kill me before they would let them have me. If any soldiers came for me, they said they would run me into Washington Parish. They said they had nothing against me, and that when the Legislature organized they would let me go. I was not at any time in charge of any sheriff or deputy sheriff of Saint Tammany. On Tuesday afternoon about two o'clock, news was received of the organization of Penn's militia. Said Consin, "You are free; only you have got to come with me before the justice of the peace to answer the charge of embezzlement against you, when we will go your bond. They then took me before Justice Lee, when Mr. Picayune Smith made a charge of embezzlement against me of taking fifteen dollars in parish warrants while I was tax-collector two years ago. These warrants are worth twenty cents on the dollar. I was the collector only two days, and settled up everything. I had no lawyer, and the case was remanded to the parish court. I was placed under bond of $500 to appear. Lieutenant Bradley, Benjamin Hosmer, and Willis Arker went my security. Yesterday, at half-past four o'clock, I left Covington for Mandeville, and arrived here at ten o'clock this morning.

[Telegram dated Headquarters Military Division of the Missouri, New Orleans, Louisiana, January 8, 1875. Received 3 a. m.]

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to submit the following brief report of affairs as they occurred here in the organization of the State Legislature on January 4, 1875. I was not in command of this military department until nine o'clock at night on the 4th instant, but I fully indorse and am willing to be held responsible for the acts of the military as conservators of the public peace upon that day. During the few days in which I was in the city prior to the 4th of January the general topic of conversation was the scenes of bloodshed that were liable to occur on that day, and I repeatedly heard threats of assassinating the governor and regrets expressed that he was not killed on the 14th of September last; also threats of the assassination of the republican members of the house, in order to secure the election of a democratic speaker. I also knew of the kidnaping by the banditti of Mr. Cousinier, one of the members-elect of the Legislature.

In order to preserve the peace and to make the State-house safe for the peaceful assembling of the Legislature, General Emory, upon the requisition of the governor, stationed troops in the vicinity of the building. Owing to these precautions the Legislature assembled in the State-house without any disturbance of the public peace. At twelve o'clock William Vigers, the clerk of the last house of representatives, proceeded to call the roll, as according to law he was empowered to do. One hundred and two legally-returned members answered to their names; of this number fifty-two were republican and fifty were democrats.

Before entering the house, Mr. J. A. Wiltz had been selected in caucus as the democratic nominee for speaker, and Mr. Michael Hahn as the republican nominee. Vigers had not yet finished announcing the result, when one of the members, Mr. Billican, of Lafourche, nominated Mr. J. A. Wiltz for temporary speaker. Vigers promptly declared the motion out of order at that time, when some one put the question, and, amid the cheers of the democratic side of the house, Mr. Wiltz dashed on to the rostrum, pushed aside Mr. Vigers, seized the speaker's chair and gavel, and declared himself speaker.

A protest against this arbitrary and unlawful proceeding was promptly made by members of the majority, but Wiltz paid no attention to their protests, and upon a motion from some one on the democratic side of the house declared one Trezevant nominated and elected clerk of the house. Mr. Trezevant at once sprang forward and occupied the clerk's chair amid the wildest confusion over the whole house. Wiltz then again, on another nomination from the democratic side of the house, declared one Flood elected sergeant-at-arms, and ordered that a certain number of assistants be appointed. Instantly a large number of men throughout the hall, who had been admitted on various pretexts, such as reporters, members' friends, and spectators, turned down the lapels of their coats, upon which were pinned blue-ribbon badges, on which were printed, in gold letters, the words "assistant sergeant-at-arms," and the assembly was in the possession of the minority, and the White League of Louisiana had made good its threats of seizing the house; many of the assistant sergeants-at-arms being well known as captains of White League companies in this city. Notwithstanding the suddenness of this movement, the leading republican members had not failed to protest again and again against this revolutionary action of the minority, but all to no purpose; and many of the republicans rose and left the house in a body, together with the clerk, Mr. Vigers, who carried with him the original roll of the house, as returned by the secretary of state.

The excitement was now very great. The acting speaker directed the sergeant-at-arms to prevent the egress or ingress of members or others, and several exciting scuffles, in which knives and pistols were drawn, took place, and for a few moments it seemed that bloodshed would ensue. At this juncture Mr. Dupre, a democratic member for the parish of Orleans, moved that the military power of the General Government be invoked to preserve the peace, and that a committee be appointed to wait upon General De Trobriand, the commanding officer of the United States troops stationed at the State-house, and request his assistance in clearing the lobby. The motion was declared adopted, a committee of five, of which Mr. Dupre was made chairman, was sent to wait upon General De Trobriand, and soon returned with that officer, who was accompanied by two of his staff officers. As General De Trobriand walked down to the speaker's desk loud applause burst from the democratic side of the house. General De Trobriand asked the acting speaker if it was not possible for him to preserve order without appealing to him as a United States Army officer. Mr. Wiltz said it was not. Whereupon the general proceeded to the lobby, and, addressing a few words to the excited crowd, peace was at once restored. On motion of Mr. Dupre, Mr. Wiltz then, in the name of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, thanked General De Trobriand for his interference in behalf of law and order, and the general withdrew.

The republicans had now generally withdrawn from the hall and united in signing a petition to the governor, stating their grievances and asking his aid, which petition, signed by fifty-two legally returned members of the house, is in my possession. Immediately subsequent to the action of Mr. Wiltz in ejecting the clerk of the old house, Mr. Billieu moved that two gentlemen from the parish of De Soto, one from Winn, one from Bienville, and one from Iberia, who had not been returned by the returning board, be sworn in as members, and they were accordingly sworn in by Mr. Wiltz and took seats upon the floor as members of the house. A motion was now made that the house proceed with its permanent organization, and accordingly the roll was called by Mr. Trezevant, the acting clerk, and Wiltz declared elected speaker and Trezevant clerk of the house.

Acting on the protest made by the majority of the house, the governor now requested the commanding general of the department to aid him in restoring order, and enable the legally returned members of the house to proceed with its organization according to law. This request was reasonable and in accordance with law. Remembering vividly the terrible massacre that took place in the city on the assembling of the constitutional convention in 1866, at the Mechanics' Institute, and believing that the lives of the members of the Legislature were or would be endangered in case an organization under the law was attempted, the posse was furnished, with the request that care should be taken that no member of the Legislature returned by the returning board should be ejected from the floor.

This military posse performed its duty under directions from the governor of the State, and removed from the floor of the house those persons who had been illegally seated, and who had no legal right to be there, whereupon the democrats rose and left the house, and the remaining members proceeded to effect an organization under the State laws. In all this turmoil, in which bloodshed was imminent, the military posse behaved with great discretion. When Mr. Wiltz, the usurping speaker of the house, called for troops to prevent bloodshed, they were given him. When the governor of the State called for a posse for the same purpose and to enforce the law, it was furnished also. Had this not been done, it is my firm belief that scenes of bloodshed would have ensued.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, January 10, 1875—11.30 p. m.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Since the year 1866 nearly thirty-five hundred persons, a great majority of whom were colored men, have been killed and wounded in this State. In 1868 the official record shows that eighteen hundred and eighty-four were killed and wounded. From 1868 to the present time no official investigation has been made, and the civil authorities, in all but a few cases, have been unable to arrest, convict, and punish perpetrators. Consequently, there are no correct records to be consulted for information. There is ample evidence, however, to show that more than twelve hundred persons have been killed and wounded during this time on account of their political sentiments. Frightful massacres have occurred in the parishes of Bossier, Caddo, Catahoula, Saint Bernard, Saint Landry, Grant, and Orleans. The general character of the massacres in the above-named parishes is so well known that it is unnecessary to describe them.

The isolated cases can best be illustrated by the following instances, which I take from a mass of evidence now lying before me of men killed on account of their political principles: In Natchitoches Parish, the number of isolated cases reported is thirty-three; in the parish of Bienville the number of men killed is thirty; in Red River Parish the isolated cases of men killed is thirty-four; in Winn Parish the number of isolated cases where men were killed is fifteen; in Jackson Parish the number killed is twenty; and in Catahoula Parish the number of isolated cases reported where men were killed is fifty, and most of the country parishes throughout the State will show a corresponding state of affairs. The following statements will illustrate the character and kind of these outrages:

On the 30th of August, 1874, in Red River Parish, six State and parish officers, named Twitchell, Divers, Holland, Howell, Edgerton, and Willis, were taken, together with four negroes, under guard to be carried out of the State, and were deliberately murdered on the 29th of August, 1874. The White League tried, sentenced, and hung two negroes on the 28th of August, 1874. Three negroes were shot and killed at Brownsville, just before the arrival of the United States troops in this parish. Two white-leaguers rode up to a negro cabin and called for a drink of water. When the old colored man turned to draw it, they shot him in the back and killed him. The courts were all broken up in this district, and the district judge driven out.

In the parish of Caddo, prior to the arrival of the United States troops, all of the officers at Shreveport were compelled to abdicate by the White League, which took possession of the place. Among those obliged to abdicate were Walsh, the mayor, Rapers, the sheriff, Wheaton, clerk of the court, Durant, the recorder, and Ferguson and Renfro, administrators. Two colored men, who had given evidence in regard to frauds committed in the parish, were compelled to flee for their lives, and reached this city last night, having been smuggled through in a cargo of cotton.

In the parish of Bossier the White League have attempted to force the abdication of Judge Baker, the United States commissioner and parish judge, together with O'Neal, the sheriff, and Walker, the clerk of the court; and they have compelled the parish and district courts to suspend operations. Judge Baker states that the white-leaguers notified him several times that if he became a candidate on the republican ticket, or if he attempted to organize the republican party, he should not live until election.

They also tried to intimidate him through his family by making the same threats to his wife, and when told by him that he was a United States commissioner they notified him not to attempt to exercise the functions of his office. In but few of the country parishes can it be truly said that the law is properly enforced, and in some of the parishes the judges have not been able to hold court for the past two years. Human life in this State is held so cheaply that when men are killed on account of political opinions, the murderers are regarded rather as heroes than as criminals in the localities where they reside, and by the White League and their supporters.

An illustration of the ostracism that prevails in the State may be found in a resolution of a White League club in the parish of De Soto, which states, "That they pledge themselves under (no?) circumstances after the coming election to employ, rent land to, or in any other manner give aid, comfort, or credit to any man, white or black, who votes against the nominees of the white man's party." Safety for individuals who express their opinion in the isolated portions of this State has existed only when that opinion was in favor of the principles and party supported by the Ku-Klux and White League organizations. Only yesterday Judge Myers, the parish judge of the parish of Natchitoches, called on me upon his arrival in this city, and stated that in order to reach here alive he was obliged to leave his home by stealth, and after nightfall, and make his way to Little Rock, Arkansas, and come to this city by way of Memphis.

He further states that while his father was lying at the point of death in the same village, he was unable to visit him for fear of assassination, and yet he is a native of the parish, and proscribed for his political sentiments only. It is more than probable that if bad government has existed in this State it is the result of the armed organizations, which have now crystallized into what is called the White League; instead of bad government developing them, they have by their terrorism prevented to a considerable extent the collection of taxes, the holding of courts, the punishment of criminals, and vitiated public sentiment by familiarizing it with the scenes above described. I am now engaged in compiling evidence for a detailed report upon the above subject, but it will be some time before I can obtain all the requisite data to cover the cases that have occurred throughout the State. I will also report in due time upon the same subject in the States of Arkansas and Mississippi.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

The following is from the platform adopted by the White League in Saint Mary's, on the 13th of July:

"We enter into and form this league for the protection of our own race against the daily increasing encroachments of the negro, and are determined to use our best endeavors to purge our legislative, judicial, and ministerial offices from such a horde of miscreants as now attempt to lord it over us.

"That to accomplish this end we solemnly pledge our honor to each other to give our hearty support to all that this league may determine by a majority of votes cast at any regular meeting, and to aid to the utmost of our ability in carrying out such measures as it may adopt.

"That we do not reject or condemn any white man for his political opinions, so that he join us in the one grand object we have in view."

The following is from the platform of the White League, adopted at Alto on the 11th of July:

"That we regard it the sacred and political duty of every member of this club to discountenance and socially proscribe all white men who unite themselves with the radical party; and to supplant every political opponent in all his vocations by the employment and support of those who ally themselves with the white man's party; and we pledge ourselves to exert our energies and use our means to the consummating of this end."

The following resolution was adopted at the White League convention at Franklin on the 1st of August:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that every member of the White League organization is in honor and duty bound zealously to support and vote for each and every regular nominee of the organization, to the exclusion of all other candidates or persons whatever."

The following is from the Enterprise of the 6th of August, published at Franklin, Saint Mary's Parish:

"We ask for no assistance; we protest against any intervention. * * * We own this soil of Louisiana, by virtue of our endeavor, as a heritage from our ancestors, and it is ours and ours alone. Science, literature, history, art, civilization, and law belong alone to us and not to the negroes. They have no record but barbarism and idolatry, nothing since the war but that of error, incapacity, beastliness, voudouism, and crime. Their right to vote is but the result of the war, their exercise of it a monstrous imposition, and a vindictive punishment upon us for that ill-advised rebellion.

"Therefore are we banded together in a White League army, drawn up only on the defensive, exasperated by continual wrong, it is true, but acting under Christian and high-principled leaders, and determined to defeat these negroes in their infamous design of depriving us of all we hold sacred and precious on the soil of our nativity or adoption or perish in the attempt.

"Come what may, upon the radical party must rest the whole responsibility of the conflict, and as sure as there is a just God in heaven, their unnatural, cold-blooded, and revengeful measures of reconstruction in Louisiana will meet with a terrible retribution."

The following is from the Natchitoches Vindicator of July 18, addressed to colored citizens:

"The white people intend to carry the State election this fall. This intention is deliberate and unalterable, from the fact that their very existence depends upon it; and that you may enjoy the blessings which will naturally follow such an event, blessings made doubly sweet when you know you were partly instrumental in bringing them about, we desire your co-operation, and we simply ask you, Will you assist us in redeeming your State from the degradation and ruin she now is in, or will you follow still the advice of those who have placed her thus? Take time to answer it, and let your mind, should you decide affirmatively, be at rest for your future welfare and happiness. We propose to do for you more than any party has yet done for you. On the other hand, should you imagine that the teaching of your former rulers is correct, and you elect to attempt, for it will only be an attempt, to continue their rule, then you must take the consequences. For we tell you now, and let it be distinctly remembered that you have fair warning, that we intend to carry the State of Louisiana in November next, or she will be a military territory."

The following is from the Minden Democrat:

"The remedy for all the evils that afflict our State, and every Southern State under negro and carpet-bag rule, is very simple. The incendiaries who flood our country at the approach of every election must be looked after; the proceedings of midnight gatherings in dark and gloomy places must be known. Incendiary teachings of the carpet-baggers and scalawags to inflame the minds of the negroes must not be tolerated again."

The following is from the Mansfield Reporter of July 4 and July 11:

"There is nothing to be gained by pleadings or concessions, but everything is within our reach, if we will move forward and grasp it. Let our actions be such that everybody will know what we want, and let them see that we are in earnest, and are determined to carry out the programme, regardless of the consequences.

"The lines must be drawn at once, before our opponents are thoroughly organized, for by this means we will prevent many milk-and-cider fellows from falling into the enemy's ranks. While the white man's party guarantees the negro all of his present rights, they do not intend that white carpet-baggers and renegades shall be permitted to organize and prepare the negroes for the coming campaign. Without the assistance of these villains the negroes are totally incapable of effectually organizing themselves, and unless they are previously excited and drilled one-half of them will not come to the polls, and a large per cent. of the remainder will vote the white man's ticket."

The following is from the Alexandria Democrat of July 15:

"The people have determined that the Kellogg government has to be gotten rid of, and they will not scruple about the means, as they have done in the past."

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 29:

"There has been some red-handed work done in this parish that was necessary, but it was evidently done by cool, determined, and just men, who knew just how far to go, and we doubt not if the same kind of work is necessary it will be done.

"We say again that we fully, cordially, approve what the white men of Grant and Rapides did at Colfax; the white man who does not is a creature so base that he shames the worst class of his species. We say again we are going to carry the elections in this State next fall.

"If the Federal Government again strikes them down, then let the infamy of the deed rest upon the shameless despotism that has arisen out of the malignancy and hate of the northern people, beneath whose withering influence no sentiment of liberty can survive; under whose policy of meanness, cowardice, and hate every community that does not worship it must be trampled in the dust, and every civilization that does not pay tribute to it blasted by its curse."

The following is from the Shreveport Times of August 5:

"It has been charged that the white man's party expects to achieve success by intimidation. This is strictly true. We intend to succeed by intimidation, and we place little confidence in our numerical strength, as shown in the figures above given from the ninth census. We rely for success solely upon intimidation, but not that intimidation which is the result of violence and bloodshed; our weapons are not to be improved rifles and six-shooters; the intimidation we propose to win by is that which a great and just cause inspires in its opponents; the intimidation which intellect, virtue, and all the manly qualities exercise over ignorance, superstition, and human depravity; the intimidation with which the spread banners of a triumphant civilization fills the hearts of its foes, and with which the Cross of Christianity strikes the howling dervishes of brutal superstition.

"THE INFAMOUS DEAD.

"Our dispatches this morning contain the gratifying intelligence that the infamous wretch DeKlyne is dead. Of all the low and dirty beasts that radicalism has imposed upon Louisiana, this scoundrel was the meanest and lowest.

"Some squeamish people may think that now the fellow is dead he should not be abused. We think differently; such men are a disgrace to humanity, and alive or dead their infamy should be held up to the execration of the world, and the youth of the country taught to loathe and despise their memory."

The following is from the Shreveport Times of July 9:

"If a single hostile gun is fired between the whites and blacks in this and surrounding parishes, every carpet-bagger and scalawag that can be caught will in twelve hours therefrom be dangling from a limb. We do not say this in a spirit of braggadocio; we say it in the interest of peace, and we know what we are talking about."

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the message and accompanying documents lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, in accordance with the requirements of the joint resolution approved March 25, 1874, authorizing an inquiry into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera, submitting reports upon the subject from the Secretaries of the Treasury and War Departments; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Illinois, who is entitled to the floor, allows me, before he proceeds, to present a number of petitions to the Senate which are signed by many citizens of Ontario County, in the State of New York, describing themselves as farmers, and others, remonstrating, for reasons that they state, against the ratification of the reciprocity treaty with the British provinces, so called. I move their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF MAJOR POWELL'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. HOWE. I have the permission of the Senator from Illinois to make a report from the Committee on Printing. The Superintendent of Public Printing is waiting for action on it. It is but a small matter, and I hope the Senate will consider it at the present time.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution of the House of Representatives, reported from the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print the report of Major Powell's expedition in quarto form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SARGENT. Why is it that the ordinary documentary form is not retained? That is the form in which all the valuable reports have been printed.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to withdraw the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is withdrawn.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HAGER. I wish to make a motion in behalf of J. H. Merrill, a soldier of the Mexican war, who desires to withdraw certain papers that have been presented, including his discharge from the service. There has been no adverse report in the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I believe it is considered the duty of a good sailor to stand by his ship in the midst of a great storm. We have been told in this Chamber that a great storm of indignation is sweeping over this land, which will rend asunder and sink the old republican craft. We have listened to denunciations of the President, of the republicans in this Chamber, of the republican party as an organization, their acts heretofore and their purposes in reference to acts hereafter, of such a character as has seldom been listened to in this or any other legislative hall. Every fact on the side of the republican party has been perverted, every falsehood on the part of the opposition has been exaggerated, arguments have been made here calculated to inflame and arouse a certain class of the people of this country against the authorities of the Government, based not upon truth but upon manufactured statements which were utterly false. The republican party has been characterized as despotic, as tyrannical, as oppressive. The course of the Administration and the party toward the southern people has been denounced as of the most tyrannical character by men who have received clemency at the hands of this same party.

Now, sir, what is the cause of all this vain declamation? What is the cause of all this studied denunciation? What is the reason for all these accusations made against a party or an administration? I may be mistaken, but, if I am not, this is the commencement of the campaign of 1876. It has been thought necessary on the part of the opposition Senators here to commence, if I may use a homely phrase, a raid upon the republican party and upon this Administration, and to base that upon false statements in reference to the conduct of affairs in the State of Louisiana.

I propose in this debate, and I hope I shall not be too tedious, though I may be somewhat so, to discuss the question that should be presented to the American people. I propose to discuss that question fairly, candidly, and truthfully. I propose to discuss it from a just, honest, and legal stand-point. Sir, what is that question? There was a resolution offered in this Chamber calling on the President to furnish certain information. A second resolution was introduced, (whether for the purpose of hanging on it an elaborate speech or not I am not aware,) asking the Committee on the Judiciary to report at once some legislation in reference to Louisiana. Without any facts presented officially arguments have been made, the country has been aroused, and some people have announced themselves in a manner calculated to produce a very sore feeling against the course and conduct of the party in power. I say this is done without the facts; without any basis whatever; without any knowledge officially communicated to them in reference to the conduct of any of the parties in the State of Louisiana. In discussing this question we ought to have a stand-point; we ought to have a beginning; some point from which we may all reason and see whether or not any great outrage has been perpetrated against the rights of the American people or any portion of them.

I then propose to start at this point, that there is a government in the State of Louisiana. Whether that government is a government of right or not is not the question. Is there a government in that State against which treason, insurrection, or rebellion may be committed? Is there such a government in the State of Louisiana as should require the maintenance of peace and order among the citizens of that State? Is there such a government in the State of Louisiana as requires the exercise of Executive authority for the purpose of preserving peace and order within its borders? I ask any Senator on this floor to-day if he can stand up here as a lawyer, as a Senator, as an honest man, and deny the fact that a government does exist? Whether he calls it a government de jure or a government de facto, it is immaterial. It is such an organization as involves the liberties and the protection of the rights of the people of that State. It will not do for Senators to talk about the election of 1872. The election of 1872 has no more to do with this "military usurpation" that you speak of to-day than an election of a hundred years ago. It is not a question as to whether this man or that was elected. The question is, is there such a government there as can be overturned, and has there been an attempt to overturn it? If so, then what is required to preserve its status or preserve the peace and order of the people?

But the other day when I asked the question of a Senator on the other side, who was discussing this question, whether or not he indorsed the Penn rebellion, he answered me in a playful manner that excited the mirth of people who did not understand the question, by saying that I had decided that there was no election, and that therefore there was no government to overturn. Now I ask Senators, I ask men of common understanding if that is the way to treat a question of this kind; when asked whether insurrection against a government recognized is not an insurrection and whether he indorses it, he says there is no government to overturn. If there is no government to overturn, why do you make this noise and confusion about a Legislature there? If there is no State government, there is no State Legislature. But I will not answer in that manner. I will not avoid the issue; I will not evade the question. I answer there is a Legislature, as there is a State government, recognized by the President, recognized by the Legislature, recognized by the courts, recognized by one branch of Congress, and recognized by the majority of the citizens by their recognition of the laws of the State; and it will not do to undertake to avoid questions in this manner.

Let us see, then, starting from that stand-point, what the position of Louisiana is now, and what it has been. On the 14th day of September last a man by the name of Penn, as to whom we have official information this morning, with some seven or ten thousand white-leaguers made war against that government, overturned it, dispersed it, drove the governor from the executive chamber, and he had to take refuge under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, on the soil occupied by the United States custom-house, where the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States Government extends, for the purpose of protecting his own life.

This then was a revolution; this then was a rebellion; this then was treason against the State, for which these men should have been arrested, tried, and punished. Let gentlemen dodge the question as they may; it may be well for some men there who engaged in this treasonable act against the government that they had Mr. Kellogg for governor. It might not have been so well for them, perhaps, had there been some other man in his place. I tell the Senator from Maryland if any crowd of armed men should undertake to disperse the government of the State of Illinois, drive its governor from the executive chamber, enter into his private drawers, take his private letters, and publish them, and act as those men did, some of them would pay the penalty either in the penitentiary or by dancing at the end of a rope.

But when this rebellion was going on against that State, these gentlemen say it was a State affair; the Government of the United States has nothing to do with it! That is the old-fashioned secession doctrine again. The Government of the United States has nothing to do with it! This National Government is made up of States, and each State is a part of the Government, each is a part of its life, of its body. It takes them all to make up the whole; and treason against any part of it is treason against the whole of it, and it became the duty of the President to put it down, as he did do; and, in putting down that treason against the Kellogg government, the whole country almost responded favorably to his action.

But our friend from Maryland, not in his seat now, [Mr. HAMILTON] said that that was part of the cause of the elections going as they did. In other words, my friend from Maryland undertook in a round-about way to indorse the Penn rebellion, and claim that people of the country did the same thing against the government of the State of Louisiana, and on this floor since this discussion has been going on, not one Senator on that side of the chamber has lisped one word against the rebellion against the government of the State of Louisiana, and all who have spoken of it have passed it by in silence so as to indicate clearly that they indorse it, and I believe they do.

Then, going further, the President issued his proclamation requiring those insurgents to lay down their arms and to resume their peaceful pursuits. This morning we have heard read at the clerk's desk that these men have not yet complied fully with that proclamation. Their rebellious organization continued up to the time of the election and at the election. When the election took place, we are told by some of these Senators that the election was a peaceable and a fair election: that a majority of democrats were elected. That is the question we propose to discuss as well as we are able to do it. They tell us that there was no intimidation resorted to by any one in the State of Louisiana. I dislike very much to follow out these statements that are not true and attempt to controvert them because it does seem to me that we ought to act fairly and candidly in this Chamber and discuss questions without trying to pervert the issue or the facts in connection with it.

Now, I state it as a fact, and I appeal to the Senator from Louisiana to say whether or not I state truly, that on the night before the election in Louisiana notices were posted all over that country on the doors of the colored republicans and the white republicans, too, of a character giving them to understand that if they voted their lives would be in danger; and here is one of the notices posted all over that country:

This "2 x 6" was to show the length and width of the grave they would have. Not only that, but the negroes that they could impose upon and get to vote the democratic ticket received, after they had voted, a card of safety; and here is that card issued to the colored people whom they had induced to vote the democratic ticket, so that they might present it if any white-leaguers should undertake to plunder or murder them:

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 28, 1874.

This is to certify that Charles Durassa, a barber by occupation, is a Member of the 1st Ward Colored Democratic Club, and that at the late election he voted for and worked in the interests of the Democratic Candidates.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER,
President 1st Ward Col'd Democratic Club.

NICK HOPE, Secretary.

ROOMS DEMOCRATIC PARISH COMMITTEE,
New Orleans, Nov. 28, 1874.

The undersigned, Special Committee, appointed on behalf of the Parish Committee, approve of the above Certificate.

ED. FLOOD, Chairman.
PAUL WATERMAN.
ATTEST: H. J. RIVET.

J. H. HARDY, Ass't Secretary Parish Committee.

These were the certificates given to negroes who voted the democratic ticket, that they might present them to save their lives when attacked by the men commonly known as Ku-Klux or white-leaguers in that country; and we are told that there is no intimidation in the State of Louisiana!

Our friend from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] has been very profuse in his declamation as to the civility and good order and good bearing of the people of Louisiana and the other Southern States. But, sir, this intimidation continued up to the election. After the election, it was necessary for the governor of that State to proceed in some manner best calculated to preserve the peace and order of the country. Certain men were known to be elected to the Legislature, and one person elected to a State office. I ask now, in furtherance of what I am saying in reference to intimidation, that the Secretary read from one of the journals of Louisiana a statement, made after the election, to show that the intimidation still continued.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SHREVEPORT, November 16, 1874.

The following extracts from an editorial in the Times yesterday but faintly reflect sentiments expressed in a hundred speeches made in Northern Louisiana by prominent White League leaders before and since the election:

"We want no representative on the returning board, no favors or concessions from Kellogg and Packard. * * * We know the results of the election in every parish. * * * Therefore we should simply give the members of that board to distinctly understand that unless they return the elections as they were returned at the polls, they and those they seek to count in will pay the forfeit with their lives. We have no appeals to make to our fellow-citizens of New Orleans. We know that the men of the 14th of September will do their whole duty as freemen and Louisianians jealous of their liberties; but throughout the country parishes there should be concert of action, and that action should be prompt and emphatic. In every parish where the officers elected by the people may be counted out by the returning board, the people should use hemp or ball on the defeated candidates counted in.

"To localize the proposition: If George L. Smith is counted in over W. M. Levy, or if Twitchell is counted in over Elam, let Smith and Twitchell be killed. If Johnson and Tyler, in De Soto, are counted in over Scales and Schuler, as the New Orleans Republican thinks; or if Keating, Levisee, and Johnson, in Caddo, are counted in over Vaughn, Horan, and Land, then let Johnson, Tyler, Keating, Levisee, and Johnson be killed. And so let every officer, from Congressman down to constable, in every district and parish of the State, be served, whom the people have defeated and whom the returning board may count in. We cannot afford to be defeated by a ring of political scoundrels after we have triumphed. * * * Human life may be precious; but the lives of all these carpet-baggers and radical politicians in Louisiana are valueless, compared with the worth of a single principle of justice and liberty."

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, in the face of what has been said on this floor, a kind of sport-making of the statements of intimidation of the voters of the South, am I not justified in bringing forward this statement? What is it? That if certain men, republicans, are announced as elected to the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, they shall be murdered. Murdered; why? Murdered because they are republicans, elected to the legislature of a sovereign State, naming the men; that, if the returning board announce their election, they shall be murdered! Yet our democratic friends on the other side sneer at the idea of republicans being intimidated or murdered on account of their peculiar notions in the Southern States. This was in the State of Louisiana, and Louisiana is the State with which we are dealing now, and not the State of Georgia. I here will say for the benefit of my friend from Georgia—for I am his friend personally—that he is in the habit of bringing Georgia in all the time when we talk about intimidation, alleging that Georgia is peaceful. I will speak to that before I am through; I am now confining my attention to Louisiana.

If we take into consideration this declaration in one of the leading newspapers; if we take into consideration the notices given to the people all over the country on the day before the election; if we take into consideration the Penn rebellion of the 14th of September; and if we then go back for a period and take into view the bloody riot in New Orleans in 1866, when a convention was being assembled in that State, what are we to conclude? In 1866 these same men went into that convention and killed and wounded over two hundred, as I have the authentic report, made by the medical officers who examined the killed and wounded on that occasion, to show. Some thirty-odd were killed, and the rest, amounting to over two hundred, were wounded on that occasion. Why? Because they went in convention to declare their views in reference to certain propositions. If we take all this into consideration and then follow it down until we come to the massacre at Colfax, what was that? I have here a pamphlet published, containing extracts from one of the papers in the State of Louisiana, the New Orleans Times, and I will read from it in regard to that transaction:

Sunday night, shortly after dark, the boat landed at a wood-pile about a mile above Colfax, Grant Parish, and a young fellow, armed to the teeth and very much excited, came aboard and requested the captain to land at Colfax and take some wounded white men to Alexandria, about twenty-five miles farther down the river.

On arriving at Colfax we found about a hundred armed men on the bank, and most of the passengers, myself among the number, went ashore to view the "battle-ground," for our young friend who came aboard at the wood-pile informed us "that if we wanted to see dead niggers, here was a chance, for there were a hundred or so scattered over the village and the adjacent fields," and he kindly offered to guide us to the scene of action.

Almost as soon as we got to the top of the landing, sure enough we began to stumble on them, most of them lying on their faces, and, as I could see by the dim light of the lanterns, riddled with bullets.

One poor wretch, a stalwart-looking fellow, had been in the burning court-house, and as he ran out with his clothes on fire had been shot. His clothes to his waist were all burned off, and he was literally broiled.

We came upon bodies every few steps, but the sight of this fellow who was burned, added to the horrible smell of burning human flesh—the remains of those who were shot in the court-house, which was still on fire—sickened most of us and caused a general cry of "Let's go back."

I counted eighteen of the misguided darkies, and was informed that they were not one-fourth of the number killed; that they were scattered here and there in the fields around the town, besides several in and around the burning court-house. This, however, was probably an exaggeration.

To show how terribly incensed the people were against the negroes, I relate the following incidents:

We came across one negro whose clothes were smoking, and who had probably been in the fire. Some of our party remarked that he was alive. Instantly one of our guides whipped out a six-shooter, saying "I'll finish the black dog." Of course we remonstrated and he put away his weapon. Some one stooped down and turned the negro over. He was stiff and cold.

A few minutes afterward we came on a big black fellow who was reclining on his elbow, and to all appearances alive. The man with the six-shooter hit him a fierce kick with his boot, and then stooped down and examined him, saying: "O, he's dead as hell." It was so; the darky died that way—in a reclining position.

When we came back near the landing the boat's crew were carrying aboard the two wounded white men, a Mr. Hadnot and another whose name I did not learn.

Sir, I ask you what Governor Kellogg was to do after the scene of 1866, after that horrible scene at Colfax; after the taking possession of five persons at Coushatta, northern men who had gone there with their capital and invested it and built up a thriving little village, but who were taken out and murdered in cold blood; and not only that, but they had murdered one of the judges and the district-attorney, and compelled the judge and district attorney of that jurisdiction to resign, and then murdered the acting district attorney. My friend from Georgia said in his way and manner of saying things, "Why do you not try these people for murdering those men at Coushatta? You have the judge and you have the district attorney?" Unfortunately for my friend's statement, we have neither. Your friends had murdered the attorney, and had murdered a judge before the new judge had been appointed, who had to resign to save his life. The acting district attorney was murdered by the same "banditti" that murdered the five northern men at Coushatta.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Where was the United States court at that time? Where was the enforcement act? Where was the Army of the United States? Could not the United States court under the enforcement act take cognizance of these facts? Was the district attorney of the United States court not present?

Mr. LOGAN. I will inform the Senator where they were. The district attorney was in his grave, put there by your political friends. The judge had been murdered a year before. The one appointed in his place had to resign to save his life. The United States court was in New Orleans. And he asks where was the United States Army? Great God! do you want the Army? I thought you had been railing against its use. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just one moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I confess to the Senator now that I am overwhelmed. When he comes at me with that argument I am utterly undone. It is always easier to attack the defeated; it is always easier for power to triumph than for truth; but truth will prevail in the end. If the Senator thinks by a thrust such as he has given that he makes any capital for himself or his party, he is altogether welcome to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not trying to make capital for myself nor for my party. I am trying to develop the facts and let them make capital for whoever they may. But when the Senator talks about thrusts, let him remember that he has stood upon this floor himself every day uttering denunciatory sentences against the republicans and against the Government of the United States.

Mr. GORDON. I defy the Senator to find one solitary word in any utterance of mine against the Government of the United States or against any man in authority except the miserable people who are plundering mine. He has made the charge; I ask him now to make it good or to withdraw it—one of the two.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah, well, the Senator need not commence talking to me about withdrawing.

Mr. GORDON. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not of that kind.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia will suspend. Does the Senator from Illinois consent to be interrupted?

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me to explain, I only want to say to the Senator that I think, as he has made a very grave charge against myself, it is due to him and due to a brother Senator that he make that charge specific, so that I may have the opportunity of answering it.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. If he has done me the injustice, I say I think it is due to his character that, when he finds out he has done so, he withdraw the charge.

Mr. LOGAN. I always do that when I find out that I have done any one injustice. I said that the Senator had stood upon this floor time and again in denunciation of republicans and the republican party, and I repeat it.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator said "the Government," also.

Mr. LOGAN. When I said "the Government" I meant the Administration—those who administer the Government or its affairs. I do not mean the Government, but I mean the Administration, which others here have denominated the Government. That is what I mean.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator just be kind enough to show that?

Mr. LOGAN. Now the Senator will just be kind enough to say this: If he desires to answer anything I have said, he will have ample opportunity to do it, and I will treat him in the same spirit in which he treats other men. If he treats other men kindly, in a kindly spirit will I respond to him. If he treats other men in a denunciatory tone, I tell him that is a game two can play at.

I was speaking in reference to those things that have occurred in Louisiana, and now I desire to come to the point that I intended to reach by these propositions. It is this: Taking all these statements in reference to these riots, in reference to the bloodshed, in reference to the murders at these different points, and the rebellion of the 14th September, 1874, with arms in their hands, and considering the condition of the Legislature at the time it assembled, I ask you if all these circumstances surrounding the governor of that State were not sufficient to put him on his guard and notify him that force might be used to overturn that government, and that for the purpose of repelling that force he might be necessitated to exercise and use force?

What are the facts, then? Did the governor of Louisiana use force? From what has been said in this Chamber and has rung through the country like the peals from the distant bell, you would think that this Senate, the President, and the republican party had murdered a State and were murdering the liberties of the American people. What are the facts? I assert that Kellogg was justified in believing that force was going to be used to overturn the State government of Louisiana, and I go further. I state it to be a fact that that Legislature when it met and organized under Wiltz was a revolutionary body, in revolution against the laws of the State of Louisiana.

Not one of the Senators here who have been talking about Louisiana and the outrages perpetrated there has referred to the law of the State in reference to the organization of the State Legislature. In order that we may understand ourselves as we go along—it is well enough for us to keep track of things and see whether we are getting off the line or whether we are remaining on the line—I will now call the attention of the Senate of the United States to the law of the State of Louisiana in relation to the organization of the State Legislature, and then after that I will take up the facts of the organization of this Legislature and see whether they comport with the law on that subject. The law of that State, after providing for a returning board of so many officers who are to receive the polls, count the votes, and declare who are elected by the voters of the State or of the district, declares that they shall then certify to the facts to the secretary of state. On that certificate to the secretary of state, he is to take such action in regard to the Legislature as I will read. Section 56 of the act in reference to regulating the conduct and freedom and purity of elections is as follows:

Be it further enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly, and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators-elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate, respectively, and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.

Those who hold the certificate of the secretary of state transmitted to the clerk of the old house and none other shall be competent to organize the State Legislature of the State of Louisiana. Now I appeal to the learned Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] who made a speech the other day, strong in its character and denunciatory in its tone of General Sheridan and other men, and I ask him what this law means when it says that the persons holding the certificate of the secretary of state, and none other, shall organize the Legislature of the State of Louisiana? I would like to know does that mean that other persons not holding the certificate should do it? Certainly not. It excludes all men except those holding the certificate of the secretary of state.

Well, sir, what are the facts? Let us now have the facts. I have the report of General Sheridan giving the facts of the organization of that Legislature, and I will ask that it be read. I also have the report of a committee of five of that Legislature, organized for the purpose of making an official report to the Congress of the United States. I hold that in my hand, but I will not take time to read it. It corroborates in every word the statement of General Sheridan's report. I ask now for the reading of that report by the Clerk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 8. (Received three a. m.)

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington D. C.:

I have the honor to submit the following brief report of affairs as they occurred here in the organization of the State Legislature on January 4, 1875. I was not in command of this military department until nine o'clock at night on the 4th instant, but I fully indorse and am willing to be held responsible for the acts of the military as conservators of the public peace upon that day.

During the few days I was in the city prior to the 4th of January the general topic of conversation was the scenes of bloodshed that were liable to occur on that day, and I repeatedly heard threats of assassinating the governor and regrets expressed that he was not killed on the 14th of September last; also threats of the assassination of republican members of the house, in order to secure the election of a democratic speaker. I also knew of the kidnaping by the banditti of Mr. Cousinier, one of the members-elect of the Legislature

In order to preserve the peace and to make the State-house safe for the peaceable assembling of the Legislature, General Emory, upon the requisition of the governor, stationed troops in the vicinity of the building. Owing to these precautions the Legislature assembled in the State-house without any disturbance of the public peace. At twelve o'clock William Vigers, the clerk of the last house of representatives, proceeded to call the roll, as according to law he was empowered to do. One hundred and two legally-returned members answered to their names; of this number fifty-two were republicans, and fifty were democrats.

Before entering the house Mr. L. A. Wiltz had been selected in caucus as the democratic nominee for speaker and Mr. Michael Hahn as the republican nominee. Vigers had not yet finished announcing the result, when one of the members, Mr. Billican, of Lafourche, nominated Mr. L. Wiltz as temporary speaker. Vigers promptly declared the motion out of order at that time, when some one put the question, and, amid the cheers of the democratic side of the house, Mr. Wiltz dashed on to the platform, pushed aside Mr. Vigers, seized the speaker's chair and gavel, and declared himself speaker.

A protest against this arbitrary and unlawful proceeding was promptly made by the members of the majority, but Wiltz paid no attention to those protests, and, upon a motion from some one on the democratic side of the house, declared one Trezevant nominated and elected clerk of the house. Mr. Trezevant at once sprang forward and occupied the clerk's chair, amid the wildest confusion over the whole house. Wiltz then again, on another nomination from the democratic side of the house, declared one Floord elected sergeant-at-arms, and ordered that a certain number of assistants be appointed. Instantly a large number of men throughout the hall, who had been admitted on various pretexts, such as reporters and members' friends and spectators, turned down the lapels of their coats, upon which were pinned blue-ribbon badges, on which were printed in gold letters the words, "assistant sergeant-at-arms," and the assembly was in the possession of the minority, and the White League of Louisiana had made good its threats of seizing the house, many of the assistant sergeant-at-arms being well known as captains of White League companies in this city.

Notwithstanding the suddenness of this movement, the leading republican members had not failed to protest again and again against this revolutionary action of the minority, but all to no purpose; and many of the republicans rose and left the house in a body, together with the clerk, Mr. Vigers, who carried with him the original roll of the house as returned by the secretary of state.

The excitement was now very great. The acting speaker directed the sergeant-at-arms to prevent the egress or ingress of members or others, and several exciting scuffles, in which knives and pistols were drawn, took place, and for a few moments it seemed that bloodshed would ensue. At this juncture Mr. Dupre, a democratic member from the parish of Orleans, moved that the military power of the General Government be invoked to preserve the peace, and that a committee be appointed to wait upon General De Trobriand, the commanding officer of the United States troops stationed at the State-house, and request his assistance in clearing the lobby. The motion was adopted. A committee of five, of which Mr. Dupre was made chairman, was sent to wait upon General De Trobriand and soon returned with that officer, who was accompanied by two of his staff officers.

As General De Trobriand walked down to the speaker's desk loud applause burst from the democratic side of the house. General De Trobriand asked the acting speaker if it was not possible for him to preserve order without appealing to him as a United States Army officer. Mr. Wiltz said it was not, whereupon the general proceeded to the lobby, and addressing a few words to the crowd, peace was at once restored. On motion of Mr. Dupre, Mr. Wiltz then, in the name of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, thanked General De Trobriand for his interference in behalf of law and order, and the general withdrew.

The republicans had now generally withdrawn from the hall, and united in signing a petition to the governor stating their grievances and asking his aid, which petition, signed by fifty-two legally-returned members of the house, is in my possession. Immediately, subsequent to the action of Mr. Wiltz in ejecting the clerk of the old house, Mr. Billien moved that two gentlemen from the parish of De Soto, one from Winn, one from Bienville, and one from Iberia, who had not been returned by the returning board, be sworn in as members; and they were accordingly sworn in by Mr. Wiltz, and took seats upon the floor as members of the house. A motion was now made that the house proceed with its permanent organization; and accordingly the roll was called by Mr. Trezevant, the acting clerk, and Wiltz was declared elected speaker and Trezevant clerk of the house.

Acting on the protest made by the majority, the governor now requested the commanding general of the department to aid him in restoring order and enable the legally-returned members of the house to proceed with its organization according to law. This request was reasonable and in accordance with law. Remembering vividly the terrible massacre that took place in this city on the assembling of the constitutional convention in 1866 at the Mechanics' Institute, and believing that the lives of the members of the Legislature were or would be endangered in case an organization under the law was attempted, the posse was furnished, with the request that care should be taken that no member of the Legislature returned by the returning board should be ejected from the floor.

This military posse performed its duty under directions from the governor of the State, and removed from the floor of the house those persons who had been illegally seated and who had no legal rights to be there, whereupon the democrats arose and left the house, and the remaining members proceeded to effect an organization under the State laws. In all this turmoil, in which bloodshed was imminent, the military posse behaved with great discretion. When Mr. Wiltz, the usurping speaker of the house, called for troops to prevent bloodshed, they were given him. When the governor of the State called for a posse for the same purpose and to enforce the law, it was furnished also. Had this not been done, it is my firm belief that scenes of bloodshed would have ensued.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, after having read the law which requires that none but persons certified to by the secretary of state as being members of the Legislature shall participate in that organization, I sent to the desk the official report of General Sheridan. That official report is corroborated by the report of a committee of five who have drawn up a memorial and sent it to Congress. It is not only corroborated by that, but is corroborated by the message of the President which has been read at the desk this morning. There, then, are the three official reports made to the Congress of the United States, showing what? Showing that on the 4th of January a body of men assembled in New Orleans and by force organized one house of the Legislature of that State, including five men that the law said should not be included in the organization of the house. The Lieutenant-General of the Army says that he heard frequent threats. Threats of what? Threats of assassination. Of whom? Of members. For what purpose? For the purpose of giving a majority of that house to the democratic party. It was first understood that there were fifty-three democrats elected and fifty-three republicans. They kidnaped one republican member, conveyed him away across the country, and held him there until the day after that organization had taken place, in order to give the democratic party a majority. And yet these kidnapers and murderers are not to be denounced in this Chamber! They are the "gentlemen" of Louisiana, I presume. After kidnaping a member to give them a majority, they then inducted into office five men having no certificates whatever. What else? In order to show the conspiracy on the part of these white-leaguers and traitors to their government, what do they do? They had some twenty-five men already selected and put in that chamber, with a badge under the lapel of their coats, and on it in gilt letters "assistant sergeant-at-arms." Without any election, without any appointment, they were there on the floor of that house—to do what? To aid in overturning that Legislature and in overturning the State government.

What further? As soon as this revolutionary proceeding occurred by Mr. Wiltz seizing the gavel and taking the chair, by Mr. Trezevant seizing the clerk's desk, and then declaring the house organized to the exclusion of fifty-two republican members who were the majority in that hall at that time, only fifty democrats being present, confusion reigned in the hall, pistols and knives were drawn, and bloodshed was about to occur. What then took place? These democrats, who now stand aghast and tremble at the use of the Army as though Banquo's ghost had made its appearance, passed a resolution and appointed five of their number to wait on the Army and ask hem to go into that hall and preserve order that they might proceed with their deliberations. Who? They, the democrats; and when General De Trobriand appeared in that hall the democrats cheered. Cheered what? The approach of the Army into a State Legislature—for what purpose? To keep them in power. They cheered at that; and is it not strange that they did not cheer the second time that he appeared? It makes a difference whose ox is gored. When he appeared and produced quiet on the democratic side, they cheered. Not a word would have been heard on that side of this Chamber if General De Trobriand had installed Mr. Wiltz and sworn him in, and the democratic party had gone on and turned Kellogg out. It would have been, as the Senator from Maryland said the other day, the rising of the spirit of liberty in the people and taking possession of their own rights. But the scene was changed very soon.

Fifty-two republicans having certificates claimed the right to participate in the organization of that house. They were denied that right by this armed mob, by these armed servile tools of the White League, and robbers and murderers of that city who had been placed there for the purpose of awing honest men, awing men who were peaceably inclined. They did do it. What was the result? The result was that Governor Kellogg then ordered General De Trobriand to do what? I have the orders here, and I will read them:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 4.

General DE TROBRIAND, Commanding:

An illegal assembly of men having taken possession of the hall of the house of representatives, and the police not being able to dislodge them, I respectfully request that you will immediately clear the hall and State-house of all persons not returned as legal members of the house of representatives by the returning board of the State.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, January 4.

General DE TROBRIAND:

The clerk of the house, who has in his possession the roll issued by the secretary of state of legal members of the house of representatives, will point out to you those persons now in the hall of the house of representatives returned by the legal returning board of the State.

WM. P. KELLOGG,
Governor of the State.

It will be seen by these official communications that Governor Kellogg took no action whatever until that Legislature had been attempted to be organized by a mob, until the elected members had been excluded from their right to participate in that organization. What then was left for him to do? He could not with his police force keep order. What then was he required to do? As governor of that State, in my judgment, it was his duty to resort to all the means in his power to restore order to that State and preserve the peace. He then ordered the military. They need not have obeyed him, but they did obey him. What was his order? To clear the chamber, not of members elected, but of the disturbing element, the persons not elected, those who were disturbing the peace and quiet of the organization. What did they do? They went there and did remove the men not elected, and left the men on both sides, democrats and republicans, who had certificates of election, there to organize the Legislature. The democrats withdrew and the republicans organized. These are the facts. No elected member was ejected; no officer rightfully in possession of authority in that house was removed or ejected or overawed in any way whatever. No blood was shed. It was done in a quiet and orderly manner. And for this has Grant, has Sheridan, has the republican party been denounced from one end of this land to the other by clamorous democrats and their allies!

In the first place we see that Governor Kellogg issued this order. Sheridan had nothing to do with it; Grant had nothing to do with it; the Senate had nothing to do with it; but Kellogg must take the responsibility of issuing the order and the troops take the responsibility of obeying the order. There is the responsibility, and there is the whole of it. Your denunciation of President Grant for using the Army in a legislative body goes for naught, for he knew no more about it than you did until he saw it announced in the public prints.

He is denounced in this Chamber as a usurper, as a tyrant, as an oppressor of the South, in regard to a matter that he knew no more about than you did yourselves. But you could not wait until the information came; you could not wait until you could hear the truth; you could not wait to see the facts; you could not wait for the country to hear the facts; you must present a false statement before the country to have a clamor raised before the truth could come, all for political purposes and for nothing else.

Now, sir, without justifying or excusing in any way whatever the action of Governor Kellogg, I say it is his action. He is responsible for it. But I should like to put a few cases to the democracy here, and before I am through I will show that you have indorsed usurpations ten times as strong as this you accuse the military of at New Orleans, and I will show it from the records, not to be disputed.

I ask you what was Kellogg to do with all these things conspiring together to convince him that a revolution was imminent, to convince him that rebellion was rife there in his own State, that his authority would be ignored, that treason would be perpetrated against the State? I ask you what was left for him to do? Must he quietly submit, must he allow an unauthorized mob, without law or authority, to organize itself in defiance of law, and when organized to carry out the treasonable plot against the government? And what was that? As detailed by a man who was in the conspiracy himself to a member of the House of Representatives, a man once elected or pretended to be to the Senate of the United States, the conspiracy was, if that Legislature were organized with Wiltz at its head, to seize the organization, and then with scaling-ladders, if necessary, to take possession of the senate chamber, inaugurate the McEnery senate which had been out for two years, and then put Kellogg out and install McEnery, and appeal to the democratic party to sustain them in their revolution. That was the conspiracy. These are the facts that will be established—a conspiracy against the government, with an understanding that they would be sustained by the democratic party all over the country, and that then Grant could not possibly undertake to put down or change that government after it was once established.

Let me say here to-day that this raid which has been made in the Senate Chamber, and by the New York press, by the New York meeting before the facts have been placed before the country, bears witness to the fact that there must have been some kind of understanding with somebody that revolution was to be produced in this country for the purpose of overturning the Louisiana State government. I do not say that men in this Chamber understood it. I say no such thing; but men somewhere understood it. There seems to be a kind of spontaneous outburst all over the country on one side against usurpation, based on falsehood carried with the wings of lightning all over this land, when truth refutes every word that has been stated in this Chamber and elsewhere in reference to the organization of that Legislature.

But, sir, I propose to go a little further in my notions than some of my political friends. I believe when a State government is about to be overturned that the State authorities have a right to call to their aid that necessary force which will protect them in their legal authority. I believe the Government of the United States, as a government, has a right to call to its support that necessary force which will subdue insurrection, put down rebellion, and punish treason. I believe that no government can exist unless it has that power, and unless it will at times exercise that power. Why do I believe this? The life of the citizen is the life of the State; the death of its citizens is the death of the State; and war upon its citizens is a war upon the State. There is a God-given right inherent in every man to use such means as may be within his power of employment to protect his own life and his own body from harm. It is a well-known principle in law that if a man menaces me in a threatening manner, with such deadly implements as are calculated to make me believe that he intends to perpetrate bodily harm upon my person or cause death, I have a right to take his life.

Every citizen has that inherent right in him. The State is made up of an aggregation of citizens. Each citizen that becomes a part of that aggregate body takes with him that inherent right. When, then, we are aggregated together as citizens of a State, we as a government or a State have that inherent right, whether expressed on our statute-books or not, of self-preservation. That inherent right of self-preservation gives to us the right to exercise such power as may be within our command to preserve the life of the State as well as to preserve the life of its citizens. Then, sir, when a State is threatened, when a nation is threatened with revolution, with treason, when its life is threatened, that inherent right that comes from above and not from statute, belongs to it to employ such means as will preserve the life and authority of that State.

If to-day the democratic party were in power in this Senate Chamber, and you, sir, without authority of law were to seize that gavel and demand obedience to your authority, and the republican minority (if they were in the minority) should have around them here all this vast number of men with ribbons on their coats and on them printed "Assistant sergeant-at-arms," in order to help enforce your decrees, and we should thereby overturn the rightful power in this Senate Chamber, I ask my democratic friends what would be their course? They talk about chivalry, they talk about rights, they talk about liberty. Would they acquiesce peaceably and calmly or would they resort to force? Would they not appeal to the President of the United States, and if the President by his own proclamation could not subdue the resistance, what would be the resort? Suppose the galleries here were hissing; suppose the galleries were shouting; suppose they were drawing pistols, knives, and bludgeons for the purpose of enforcing the decrees of the minority; what then would be your course? There is not a man in the Chamber, be he democrat or republican, but would answer, "We would appeal to the armed forces of the country to sustain the majesty of the Senate under the law." And yet you talk about tyranny and oppression!

Now, I will give you another illustration. On the assembling of the next House of Representatives you have a democratic majority. The law of Congress is precisely the same as the law of Louisiana; or, in other words, the law of Louisiana is copied almost verbatim from the act of Congress; and what is that? That the Clerk of the old House of Representatives shall place the names of those members on the roll who have certificates from the governors of their States of their election. Now, suppose that Clerk, being a republican, instead of placing on the roll the names of men having certificates of the governors, so as to give a democratic majority, should place a republican majority on that roll and exclude those having certificates, and in that way organize a republican House of Representatives; what would you democrats say then? Would you say "We will quietly submit; we must yield; they have captured the organization." Is that the way you would talk? No, sir; every democrat in this Chamber would rush to the other House; every democrat in this city would rush to that House. You would appeal to force; you would ask the Army, the Navy, all the power of this Government to restore order and place your party in power where they were entitled to be according to the certificates of the governors of the different States. Do you not know you would do it? Does not every man know you would? And yet you are talking about tyranny and oppression!

I should like to give my democratic friends a little taste of democracy on military usurpation, and I will do it right here. It is very well for us sometimes to look at our own record. It is well for us republicans, when we are talking sometimes and denouncing democrats, to examine our own record. Now let us examine the democratic record of this country as to military usurpation, and see what it will prove. I will commence a good way back and see who is consistent and who is not. I will commence with one of the leading democrats who has lived in this country, Andrew Jackson. Speaking of the battle of New Orleans, when the forces were under the command of General Jackson, we find this statement of facts recorded:

General Jackson was involved in much trouble by the conduct of many civilians during the campaign, who forgot that a dictatorship alone could save the State, which the enemy, had they been victorious, would probably have retained, in spite of the treaty of Ghent, on the ground that the treaty of 1803, by which France had ceded Louisiana to us, was void and of no effect, because she had no claim to the territory she had sold. A Frenchman, M. Louiallier, a member of the Legislature of Louisiana, was conspicuous among the general's enemies, and him the general had arrested on March 5. Judge Hall, of the United States district court, granted Louiallier's petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and was himself arrested and imprisoned and then banished from the city. On March 13 martial law was abrogated by Jackson's order, and Hall returned. General Jackson was then arrested on a charge of contempt of court and fined $1,000. He refused the offers that were made from all sides to pay the fine, and paid it himself, protecting the court, which could not have stood a moment against his opposition. After his retirement from public life some of his friends requested Congress to refund the amount of the fine. This petition was successful after encountering considerable opposition; and the bill refunding the money, principal and interest, was passed in February, 1844.—New American Cyclopedia, volume 9, page 683.

Over sixty years ago General Jackson arrested a member of the Louisiana Legislature right in the city of New Orleans about which this controversy is to-day; he put the judge of the United States court in jail and banished him from the city and declared martial law, for which he was fined $1,000. That same General Jackson—that same usurper as you would call him now since your patriotism is bubbling out at every pore—you elected President of the United States in a very few years after he had performed this outrageous act. You democrats did that. This deed was done after the British were gone, after they had retired. A member of the Legislature was arrested and taken out of the body, and the judge of the United States court put in jail by the man whom you elected President of the United States; and for no act was he more eulogized afterward by the democracy than for this very act of his. Without saying whether it was right or wrong, I merely give you the fact to show you what you are to-day and what you were yesterday.

Now, I want to go a little further. I want to show you how patriotic and devoted to the Constitution of the United States our pure democratic friends have always been. There occurred a little circumstance in 1854 that probably is worth relating, and I will quote from the history of the country in reference to it. There was a slave, a runaway slave, by the name of Burns, found in Boston, Massachusetts, in May, 1854. Franklin Pierce, the democratic President of the United States, did what? The marines from the navy-yard, the soldiers from Fort Independence, and the militia of Boston, under the order of a democratic President of the United States, entered the city of Boston and arrested this fugitive slave. When slavery was your plank in politics you could take the troops to enter the city of Boston and arrest a slave and return him to the State of Virginia, on a Government vessel, put him in manacles and shackles, and keep him a bondman by the force of the Army and the Navy; but when the Army is used to protect liberty and enforce law you howl as though a set of tyrants were setting fire to your houses! This, Mr. President, was democracy in 1854. It is well enough to use the Army and Navy to enslave men; but when you use the Army to enforce law, when you use the Army to protect the liberty of citizens in a State, it is an outrage, and tyranny, and oppression unheard of in a civilized country.

Now, sir, let us follow this a little further. I am not done with our democratic military records yet. There is another little instance where the majority of the democrats, when these things were taking place, joined in sustaining the use of the Army there; but while the democrats were sustaining President Pierce, you remember there was a little trouble over in Kansas. In 1856, in the Territory of Kansas, at the town of Topeka, a free State Legislature assembled. President Pierce then issued a proclamation that I will send to the Clerk and ask to be read.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A proclamation.

Whereas indications exist that public tranquillity and the supremacy of law in the Territory of Kansas are endangered by the reprehensible acts or purposes of persons both within and without the same, who propose to direct and control its political organization by force; it appearing that combinations have been formed therein to resist the execution of the territorial laws, and thus, in effect, subvert by violence all present constitutional and legal authority; it also appearing that persons residing without the Territory, but near its borders, contemplate armed intervention in the affairs thereof; it also appearing that other persons, inhabitants of remote States, are collecting money, engaging men, and providing arms for the same purpose; and it further appearing that combinations within the Territory are endeavoring by the agency of emissaries and otherwise to induce individual States of the Union to intervene in the affairs thereof, in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and whereas all such plans for the determination of the future institutions of the Territory, if carried into action from within the same will constitute the fact of insurrection, and if from without, that of invasive aggression, and will in either case justify and require the forcible interposition of the whole power of the General Government as well to maintain the laws of the Territory as those of the Union:

Now, therefore, I, Franklin Pierce, President of the United States, do issue this my proclamation to command all persons engaged in unlawful combinations against the constituted authority of the Territory of Kansas or of the United States, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes; and to warn all such persons that any attempted insurrection in said Territory, or aggressive intrusion into the same, will be resisted not only by the employment of the local militia, but also by that of any available forces of the United States, to the end of assuring immunity from violence and full protection to the persons, property, and civil rights of all peaceful and law-abiding inhabitants of the Territory.

If in any part of the Union the fury of faction or fanaticism, inflamed into disregard of the great principles of popular sovereignty which, under the Constitution, are fundamental in the whole structure of our institutions, is to bring on the country the dire calamity of an arbitrament of arms in that Territory, it shall be between lawless violence on the one side and conservative force on the other, wielded by legal authority of the General Government.

I call on the citizens both of adjoining and distant States to abstain from unauthorized intermeddling in the local concerns of the Territory, admonishing them that its organic law is to be executed with impartial justice; that all individual acts of illegal interference will incur condign punishment; and that any endeavor to intervene by organized force will be firmly withstood.

I invoke all good citizens to promote order by rendering obedience to the law; to seek remedy for temporary evils by peaceful means; to discountenance and repulse the counsels and the instigations of agitators and of disorganizers; and to testify their attachment to their country, their pride in its greatness, their appreciation of the blessings they enjoy, and their determination that republican institutions shall not fail in their hands, by co-operating to uphold the majesty of the laws and to vindicate the sanctity of the Constitution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents.

Done at the city of Washington, the 11th day of February, in the year of our [L. S.] Lord 1856, and of the Independence of the United States the eightieth.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

By the President:
W. L. MARCY, Secretary of State.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Secretary now to read the order of Jefferson Davis, the then Secretary of War, to the forces in Kansas.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1856.

SIR: The President has by proclamation warned all persons combined for insurrection or invasive aggression against the organized government of the Territory of Kansas, or associate to resist the due execution of the laws therein, to abstain from such revolutionary and lawless proceedings; and has commanded them to disperse and return peaceably to their respective abodes on pain of being resisted by his whole constitutional power. If, therefore, the governor of the Territory, finding the ordinary course of judicial proceedings and the powers vested in United States marshals inadequate for the suppression of insurrectionary combinations or armed resistance to the execution of the law, should make requisition upon you to furnish a military force to aid him in the performance of that official duty, you are hereby directed to employ for that purpose such part of your command as may in your judgment consistently be detached from their ordinary duty.

In executing this delicate function of the military force of the United States, you will exercise much caution, to avoid, if possible, collision with even insurgent citizens, and will endeavor to suppress resistance of the laws and constituted authorities by that moral force which happily, in our country, is ordinarily sufficient to secure respect to the laws of the land and the regularly-constituted authority of the Government. You will use a sound discretion as to the moment at which the further employment of the military force may be discontinued, and avail yourself of the first opportunity to return with your command to the more grateful and prouder service of the soldier—that of the common defense.

For your guidance in the premises you are referred to the acts of 28th of February, 1795, and 3d of March, 1807, and to the proclamation of the President, a copy of which is herewith transmitted.

Should you need further or more specific instructions, or should in the progress of events doubts arise in your mind as to the course which it may be proper for you to pursue, you will communicate directly with this Department, stating the points upon which you wish to be informed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Official copy:
E. D. TOWNSEND, Adjutant-General.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, it will be seen that at this time, in February, 1856, after President Pierce had issued a proclamation for the disorderly persons in the State of Kansas to disperse, Jefferson Davis, the then Secretary of War, issued an order to the troops in Kansas, putting them under command of the governor of that Territory, to be summoned at his call for the purposes he might require. What followed? Let me read:

Governor Shannon had left the Territory, and Secretary Woodson was acting governor. The latter went to Topeka, and there issued a proclamation, forbidding all persons claiming legislative power under the Topeka constitution from organizing. Colonel Sumner, acting under orders from Washington, entered the house of representatives. The roll was called by the clerk, and this officer remarked that he was about to perform the most disagreeable duty of his life, and that was, the dispersion of the Legislature. He said his orders were to disperse it; and, in answer to Judge Schuyler, he said he should employ all the force necessary to carry his orders into effect. He then entered the senate chamber, and in like manner dispersed that body.—Wilson's Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America, page 500.

There is a case for you. In 1856, under the orders of the Secretary of War, Jeff. Davis, acting under the authority of the President of the United States, your troops entered the Legislature of an inchoate State, and dispersed one house and then the other. The facts, outside of what I have read, are that Colonel Sumner, afterward General Sumner, who was killed in battle, trained his artillery on the State-house, stationed his troops at the door, and notified the Legislature that he would use all the force in his power if they did not disperse. They did disperse. That was indorsed by the majority of the democratic party all over this country; but that same democratic party who indorsed that invasion of a Legislature and that dispersion of a Legislature to-day denounce the republican party of the United States—for what? Merely because Kellogg, without the orders of the President, without the orders of the general, put out men who were not members of the Legislature, in order to organize men who were members of the Legislature, in accordance with the laws of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that at the request of a majority of the Legislature.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. He did not do that until fifty-two men, a majority of that house of the Legislature, had signed a petition to him, asking him to use the necessary force to put them in their position and to put the mob out.

Mr. SCHURZ. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does he remember the number of the members of the house of representatives in Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I think the number was one hundred and eleven allowed by law, but the number present was fifty democrats and fifty-two republicans.

Mr. SCHURZ. In that case fifty-two were not a majority of the members elected.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state now, that the Senator may understand me, there were fifty-two members on the republican side and fifty members on the democratic side who met in that hall that morning. The fifty democrats took possession of the hall with the mob that assisted them, but the fifty-two republicans, being a majority of those members present, went in a body and petitioned the governor of the State to exercise his power to put them in that hall. Is that not the fact, I ask the Senator?

Mr. SCHURZ. Is it not also the fact——

Mr. EDMUNDS. First find out whether that is the fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHURZ. Is it not also the fact that when the vote on speaker was taken fifty-seven votes were cast, one in blank, and that therefore republicans took part in the proceedings so far?

Mr. LOGAN. Is that the Senator's answer to my question?

Mr. SCHURZ. To what question, if the Senator pleases?

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if it was not the fact that the records show there were fifty democrats and fifty-two republicans who met in that hall that morning?

Mr. SCHURZ. The record, as far as I understand it, shows that fifty-two republicans went out; but as to the fifty democrats I do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, it is not necessary to have any controversy about these things. I have failed since this discussion has commenced to get the truth out of a solitary man in answer to a question of plain fact that the record presents to the country. Now, it is a fact, and the Senator does know it, that one hundered and two men responded to that roll, fifty democrats and fifty-two republicans, for that has been the record all the time, and the Senator cannot help but know it. But the facts are things that are not wanted here. They petitioned the governor to put the mob out and let the Legislature organize, and that is what he did, and all that he did, and for that Grant is denounced, and Grant knew no more about it than the Senator from Missouri. For that Sheridan is denounced and he had nothing to do with it. For that the republican party is denounced which had no knowledge of it. For that everybody in the republican party generally is denounced as not fit to control or participate in the affairs of this Government.

Sir, it is sometimes a very good thing for us to continue referring to our own record. I have another piece of history here that probably will be of some information to our well-informed democrats who have been talking so loudly about military usurpation. I have shown you that they elected one President—they elected him twice—who was one of these military usurpers. Let me read a little history about another military usurper, and for the benefit of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON.] I wish he was here. He forgot this the other day, although he is a Senator from that State. Here is a little order that I hold in my hand dated, "Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac, Washington, September 12, 1861," addressed to General Banks, a conservative independent member of the next House of Congress:

GENERAL: After full consultation with the President, Secretaries of State, War, &c., it has been decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th. Arrangements have been made to have a Government steamer at Annapolis to receive the prisoners and carry them to their destination.

Some four or five of the chief men in the affair are to be arrested to-day. When they meet on the 17th, you will please have everything prepared to arrest the whole party, and be sure that none escape.

It is understood that you arranged with General Dix and Governor Seward the modus operandi. It has been intimated to me that the meeting might take place on the 14th; please be prepared. I would be glad to have you advise me frequently of your arrangements in regard to this very important matter.

If it is successfully carried out, it will go far toward breaking the back-bone of the rebellion. It would probably be well to have a special train quietly prepared to take prisoners to Annapolis.

I leave this exceedingly important affair to your tact and discretion, and have but one thing to impress upon you, the absolute necessity of secrecy and success.

With the highest regard, I am, my dear general, your sincere friend,

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General, United States Army.

Now, what was this order for? To arrest the Maryland Legislature.

Mr. CONKLING. And Maryland had not been declared in insurrection.

Mr. LOGAN. And Maryland had not been declared in secession. General Banks issued his instructions, which I will read, to Lieutenant-Colonel Ruger, commanding the Third Wisconsin Regiment:

SIR: The Legislature of Maryland is appointed to meet in special session to-morrow, Tuesday, September 16. It is not impossible that the members, or a portion of them, may be deterred from meeting there on account of certain arrests recently made in Baltimore. It is also quite possible that on the first day of meeting the attendance may be small. Of the facts as to this matter I shall see that you are well informed as they transpire. It becomes necessary that any meeting of this Legislature at any place or time shall be prevented.

You will hold yourself and your command in readiness to arrest the members of both houses. A list of such as you are to detain will be inclosed to you herewith, among whom are to be especially included the presiding officers of the two houses, secretaries, clerks, and all subordinate officials. Let the arrests be certain, and allow no chance of failure. The arrests should be made while they are in session, I think.

There is the order. The arrest shall be made while they are in session.

You will, upon the receipt of this, quietly examine the premises. I am informed that escape will be impossible, if the entrance to the building be held by you. Of that you will judge upon examination. If no session is to be held, you will arrest such members as can be found in Frederick. The process of arrest should be to enter both houses at the same time, announcing that they were arrested by orders of the Government; command them to remain as they are, subject to your orders.

Any resistance will be forcibly suppressed, whatever the consequences. Upon these arrests being effected, the members that are to be detained will be placed on board a special train for Annapolis, where a steamer will await them.

There is the order of General George B. McClellan, a democrat; there is the instruction of General Banks, an independent member of the next Congress; and there is the arrest of the Maryland Legislature by the order of the general commanding, and you ran him for President the first chance you got afterward. And yet you are violently opposed to these arrests! How strange it is that all of these arrests, all of these usurpations, all of these outrages heretofore in this country have been committed by democrats and men who have been sustained by democrats, and yet to-day the mere authorizing of men to perform their duty under the law by an officer of the Army has caused one of the greatest commotions that ever was known in the democrat tea-pot in this country!

Mr. President, when I heard the clamor of these gentlemen here a few days ago, I commenced reflecting whether these democrats had ever done any wrong in their lives. I commenced studying, and asked myself, "Is it possible that the republican party have been such violators of law, such criminals as they have been accused of being, and that the democratic party have been pure all their lives without taint or blemish?" You would think to hear them talk in this Chamber that they were saints come down from heaven to minister here among men. Yet we find they are not saints. Yet we find, by examining history somewhat, that they have not been so saintly and pure all the days of their lives as they would make the people believe if the people would believe them. I should like merely to say this in their presence: While you have denounced Phil. Sheridan almost as a barbarian, as cruel, and inhuman, I would like merely to suggest to you that sometimes history does repeat itself. One man was made President for making New Orleans behave itself, and it might make a second.

Next, let me for a moment call the attention of the Senate and of the country to what is going on about us to-day. Our people seem to be alarmed—at what? Not at the action of President Grant, for he has taken no action; but the country is made to believe that he has perpetrated a great wrong; not that any great wrong has been done, but the mere pretense of a wrong for purposes of some kind or other—I know not what they are—which are covered up. Let me ask my democratic friends what they mean by such resolutions as these which I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read?

The Chief Clerk reak as follows:

THE VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE ON THE LOUISIANA AFFAIR.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, January 9.

The following resolutions were introduced in the senate:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia, That the governors of the States composing the United States of America be, and they are hereby, earnestly requested to convene as soon as practicable the Legislatures of their respective States, in order that the States may consult together and advise with each other respecting the late interference of the Army of the United States with the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and determine simultaneously and promptly what is necessary to be done to defend and preserve the independence and autonomy of the States.

"Resolved, That the governor of this Commonwealth be, and he is hereby, requested forthwith to telegraph these resolutions to the governors of the several States and request immediate replies."

Animated and prolonged discussion ensued, in which a spirit of moderation predominated, leading senators opposing Virginia taking the initiatory movement as a State in this grave matter. It was the general opinion, however, that Virginia should give expression of sentiment through her Legislature in the form of a protest against the action of the General Government in relation to Louisiana, and an appeal to the American people for redress, and also to express the deep and lasting sympathy of the people of Virginia with the people of their sister State of Louisiana. At the conclusion of the discussion the whole matter was laid over and made the special order for Tuesday, at one o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. Here we have old Virginia resolving that all the governors of the different States shall meet together for consultation—on what? On the outrage perpetrated by the Army of the United States on the Louisiana Legislature! Which outrage? The one that was perpetrated by the democrats calling in the military, or the one that was perpetrated by the republicans calling in the military? The one by the republicans, as a matter of course. The other could not be an outrage, because our democratic friends did it. It is only that which we do that is an outrage. I ask what does this mean? What are the governors to meet for? Suppose they conclude that it is an outrage, what do they propose to do? To secede? Is that the object? To go into another rebellion? Is that the proposition? What else do they propose? Sir, I remember well when the same kind of thing started in the South a few years ago. Resolutions were introduced in Southern State Legislatures calling the Southern States into consultation; and what was the result of that consultation? The result was rebellion and bloody war against this Government. What do all these things that now surround us prove to us? Is it for peace they want these governors to meet? Is it to suppress unlawfulness that they want them to meet? Is it to suppress Ku-Klux and White Leagues? If so, we are trying to do that without the governors meeting. Or is it for the other purpose? Is it to organize themselves together to resist the National Government of the United States, and to stand by Penn and his rebellion against the government of the State of Louisiana? Sir, methinks the latter is the purpose; that it is to stand by the insurgents in the State of Louisiana, that thereby a new rebellion may be organized against this Government. We have been told already that the northern people were tired of this thing. We have been told already that the northern people have grown surfeited in reference to this cry and in reference to the administration of these governments. We have been told already that the North was yielding to their clamor and would stand by them. In my judgment the very moment that is proven to the people of this country, there are men, and plenty of them, too, in the Southern States ready, and armed and equipped, to rise in revolt against this Government and seize it and destroy it, as was attempted once before; and this is but the mere outcropping of it in the old State of Virginia in her resolutions.

Ah! but we have been reminded on this floor of the past patriotism of Virginia. We have been told in eloquent strains that Virginia had furnished us a Washington, a Patrick Henry, and a Jefferson. True, but that was a long time ago; the second brood furnished us by Virginia did not equal the first.

I have no hate for these southern people. I would meet them to-day with an affectionate grip of the hand if they would only yield a willing obedience to the laws of the country. But until they do that, I tell them that while the northern people may be beguiled into voting their ticket and may possibly be annoyed until they will let them for a temporary purpose have control of this Government, they must not flatter themselves that they can usurp the powers of this Government and trample under foot the rights of the people, either white or black, for a much longer time, without arousing such a feeling of the northern mind and in the northern heart as will exercise that power silently which belongs to numbers at the ballot-box; and it is the only way they propose to exercise their power or control, and it is the only way that they ever attempted to do so.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to cite a section of the Constitution showing that the action proposed by the Legislature of Virginia is directly opposed to that instrument and is unconstitutional?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. It is a clause of section 10, article 1:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

Mr. DAVIS. One moment. I understand that Virginia passed no such resolution. It was introduced by some member, debated, and laid over.

Mr. SARGENT. I simply said that the action referred to, which was proposed in the Legislature of Virginia, was in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. My friend from California reads the Constitution to show that that action would be in violation of it. That is a matter that we all understand. But at the same time that we know that, that would not interfere materially with Virginia, whether it was unconstitutional or not. [Laughter.]

After discussing all these propositions and probably at more length than I should have done, I have not yet done the subject justice, nor can I. It does not belong to my feeble powers to do justice to this question, to this outrage that has been perpetrated upon the people of this country by falsifying the facts with reference to the conduct of these people within the State of Louisiana.

Some remarks have been made upon this floor peculiar in their strength and strained, I must say, in the manner of their utterance. Our amiable friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who seldom so far forgets himself as to use harsh language toward any one, in his calm and deliberate speech the other day made use of language that I must say aroused somewhat in me a feeling different from that which I desire to have in reference to that Senator, for I have always had great respect for him. He said, in speaking of General Sheridan's dispatch, "Let us see if that man Sheridan is fit to breathe the free air of a republic." He then said his acts were those of cruelty and disgraceful to the American nation. If Sheridan is not fit to breathe the free air of the Republic, I appeal to heaven to name the man in this land who is. If Sheridan, after having done as much perhaps as almost any man beneath the shining sun to preserve this Republic, is not fit to breathe its free air, tell me the name of that living man who is? What are we to infer from such language as this? If a man is not fit to breathe the free air of a republic, he is not fit to hold office under it. If his acts are disgraceful to this country, he is unfit to wear the badge of official position. All this being the case in the estimation of the Senator from Delaware, we have plainly depicted on the canvas that is now moving before us that which will be done when they succeed to power. What is it? When the democrats shall have control with their allies, what shall we expect? Sheridan is not fit to breath, the free air of a republic; he is a disgrace to the nation; he must go out. Sherman, too, indorsing Sheridan, must go out. Grant must pass away. All the men that helped save the Republic are now a disgrace to the Republic. They must bow themselves out, and you must bow yourselves in. Who bow in? Your Earlys, your Davises, and others of like ilk, your men that tried to destroy the Government by thundering at its gates for four years, trampling the Constitution and laws under foot, violating their oaths as citizens, are to take their places. Is that what you mean? I want to know it now if that is the meaning of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware. Sir, it will be a good while in this country before a little indiscreet remark in a dispatch that has no force in it, that cannot be executed in any way whatever, will cause the American people to forget the gallantry of a man like Phil. Sheridan. This country will have to be subsoiled and plowed over and the bones of every soldier in this land buried so deep that you cannot touch them before such a man will stand in disgrace for an indiscreet remark in a dispatch. The gentleman who undertook to bury his patriotism, to destroy his fair fame and his fair name by such remarks in this Chamber did not well understand the hearts of the American people.

Mr. BAYARD rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that my rights here to comment upon the character of any officer of the United States are secured to me by law, and they are to be exercised by me in my own conscientious discretion. What I have said of this officer was said sincerely, believing it to be true. If he is painted in a light that renders him discreditable to the people of this country, he is drawn so by his own hand. I asked the members of this Senate, and I asked the American people, and I repeat the question, let them read this officer's intent and meaning by his own dispatches, and then ask if he is fit to breathe the free air of a republic; and if he can breathe it and can put into effect the threats contained in his dispatches, then he will be the only man who will breathe free air, for the rest of us who survive will be the mere slaves of his will. I do not propose to enter into competition with the honorable Senator in his admiration of General Sheridan. I distinctly stated that I had no disposition to detract in the least degree from any portion of his just renown. But whatever may or may not be my admiration of military glory, I do here profess and always shall profess my superior admiration and respect for the power of the law, which the most brilliant soldier should not be permitted to surpass. The liberties of my fellow-citizens are dearer to me than the renown of the soldier who seeks only to smirch the laurels he may have gained heretofore by an assault upon the liberties of his fellow-citizens in Louisiana. His dispatch as read by me was that which I called upon the country to judge him by.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think I yielded to a speech.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, Mr. President, the honorable Senator has referred to me several times in the course of this debate. I did not desire to interrupt him, as he was making a very earnest speech; but as I had been referred to so often by him, and now again in connection with something like a peroration of that portion of his speech in respect to General Sheridan, I thought it proper just at this time to rise and say what I have said. I ask the American people to let General Sheridan draw his own character by the light of his own dispatches. If they can approve of the recommendation that the President of the United States can drive beyond the pale of the law citizens of any State, and leave them to the short rope and short shrift of a drum-head court-martial, then the honorable Senator may find that they agree with him. If not, as I believe, the great body of the law-abiding sentiment of the people of this country will agree with me in every word that I have said in regard to him.

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad that I gave the Senator an opportunity to repeat what he had said before. It only shows the feeling that there is in the heart. Sometimes when we have said hard and harsh things against a fellow-man, when we have cooling time we retract. If, after we have had cooling time, the bitterness of our heart only impels us to repeat it again, it only shows that there is deep-seated feeling there which cannot be uprooted by time. I gave the opportunity to the Senator to make his renewed attack on Sheridan. I will now say what I did not say before, since he has repeated the remark, that his attack upon Sheridan and his declaration that Sheridan is not fit to breathe the free air of a republic, is an invitation to the White Leagues to assassinate him. If he is not fit to breathe the free air, he is not fit to live. If he is not fit to live, he is but fit to die. It is an invitation to them to perpetrate murder upon him.

Now let me go further. I announce the fact here in this Chamber to-day, and I defy contradiction, that the democracy in this Chamber have denounced Sheridan more since this dispatch was published than they ever denounced Jeff. Davis and the whole rebellion during four years' war against the Constitution of this country. I dislike much to say these things; but they are true, and as the truth ought not to hurt, I will say them.

But we are told that the people of the South are loyal and true to the Government. We are told by our friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] that peace reigns in that State, peace reigns in Georgia, in Alabama, in every State in the South. When you mention here the fact that disorders are existing in Southern States you find Senators jumping up at every corner and saying, "There is no trouble in my State." Our friend from North Carolina says there is no trouble in his State. They did elect a Ku-Klux judge down there, but still they have no trouble. It was necessary probably to protect the rest of the Ku-Klux, and therefore it gave peace! My friend from Maryland says, "Give the democrats control of the Southern States and you will have peace, but you cannot have it unless they have control!" I do not doubt that this is true, but what a peace that would be! I have heard that remark before. Do you not remember—sir, I know you do—that some fourteen years ago the only remark was "Let us alone," "Let us alone?" The only remark was, "Do not interfere with us and you will have peace; if you do not make war we will not." This remark of "Let us have the States and we will give you peace" is the cry of men seeking to destroy the Government by insinuating themselves into power, and if they cannot insinuate themselves into power they will use terror, threat, murder, and everything else for that purpose. Give the democracy control and you will have peace, but if they cannot have control they will not let us have peace!

They failed to get control once before and we did not have peace. Because they could not get control they made war. If you will give them control now they will not make war, but if you do not they will. That is about the proposition. How long has it been since we have had this glorious peace in North Carolina? We have peace there now, I admit it. I have not been there, but I am told it is true. How long has it been since we have had that peace? But a short time ago men were hanged, men were murdered, men were driven from the country, men were affrighted and alarmed in that State, and armed forces had to be sent there to suppress the Ku-Klux; and the only way it was suppressed, and the only reason why you have peace in North Carolina to-day, is that we tried your Ku-Klux and sent them to the penitentiary; and Grant told you that you had to stop or he would make you do it, and you stopped through fear, not because you desired it. Men talk about always having had peace in their States, when on the trial of these Ku-Klux for their outrages such language was hardly ever heard as was uttered by the attorney of the Ku-Klux himself. He said their crimes were so atrocious that they were not to be listened to by civilized men, and they came up and confessed their crimes and many were sent to prison, and that gave peace.

But we are told that they have peace in Georgia, and my good friend from Georgia, the Senator farthest from me, [Mr. GORDON,] and he is a good-natured man, says they have perfect peace in their State; that there is no imposition upon voters, there there is no intimidation, everything is lovely; that things are in democratic hands and everything goes on quietly. I do not want to get into any discussion with him, but I believe I am safe in saying—and if he will listen to me and I do not state it correctly I am subject to be corrected—that I believe there was a time in Georgia when they had Ku-Klux in that State. If that is not true, then of course I will take it back. I do not know that the Senator himself ever belonged to them, but there is a little printed information here that might be very good for the country. I want the Senator from Georgia to understand that I do not do this for the purpose of criticising him or making any attack upon him, but I merely wish to read one or two little paragraphs of testimony taken before a committee to see whether his statement that Georgia is such a quiet and peaceable State and always has been is correct. We all know what the Ku-Klux were. The evidence before the country would satisfy anybody what the Ku-Klux organization is, what it was for, what its objects were, and what they did. Now, when this committee was taking testimony, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCOTT] is present—if I do not state correctly he can correct me—there was a gentleman sworn before that committee by the name of JOHN B. GORDON, of Georgia. I do not know whether that is the Senator or not, but that is the name given. The chairman of the committee can say, or the Senator can say himself. In speaking about the Ku-Klux the question was asked:

You say that upon that apprehension of danger this organization was founded?

He said it was founded upon an apprehension of danger and for defensive purposes. The testimony then goes on:

Question. In what year was it founded?

Answer. I do not know; I think it was in 1867 or 1868, or along there; it may have been in 1866.

Q. Did I understand you to say that it prevailed over the whole State?

A. No, sir; I supposed it did; I did not know whether it did or not.

Q. What office did you hold in it, if any?

A. I did not hold any office. I was spoken to in regard to holding an office, but I never held any. The organization never was perfected, as I have already stated.

Q. In regard to holding what office were you spoken to?

A. I do not know that it is necessary to answer that question unless you insist upon it.

Q. I insist upon an answer.

A. I was spoken to as the chief of the State. I said very emphatically that upon that line I could be called on if it was necessary. But the organization never was perfected, and I never heard anything more about it after that time.

I only read this language to give the Senator the opportunity of saying whether he belonged to it or not. This evidence would look as though he did. I find this in the report of the investigating committee.

Now, when we say that these Ku-Klux were spread over the State and they were merely for defensive purposes that is all very well, but the country understands what Ku-Klux were just as well if there were not any witness to state what they were. They know all about the band, about its organization and all about it. Now, further; I may be mistaken in saying that in my judgment our friends South, and I do not blame them for being zealous in their own cause, I find no fault with them for that, but they do not believe there is any turbulence down there, they do not believe there is any bad blood down there; and I will tell you why. My friend the Senator did not believe there was any bad blood in Georgia, and does not think there is anything wrong there because these things have continued so long. I remember in the election of 1860 I had a friend, Stephen A. Douglas, who was a friend of mine and I was a good friend of his. In that year he undertook to travel through the State of Georgia. In the town of Atlanta he was insulted, grossly insulted, there in the city of Atlanta, when he was a candidate for President of the United States. When even before the war the people had that feeling toward northern men it is not to be expected that the feeling would be more kind to-day than it was then.

I do not intend to call my friend the Senator to account for anything he said. I much prefer that his State should be in the condition that he says it is. I hope it is. I hope his people are peaceable, that they are quiet and orderly, and loyal to the Government; and I have no right to dispute his word, nor will I; but I have a communication here from a man who I expect he knows, and I will ask the Clerk to read it. The man has written it, and handed it to me, over his own signature. Of course I am not responsible for it; but he says it is a fact, and gives me the privilege to have it read at the desk, and I will ask that it be read.

WASHINGTON CITY, January 12, 1875.

SIR: In obedience to your request, I herewith submit a few facts and circumstances touching the political condition of Georgia, embraced within my knowledge and experience during the last two or three years. * * * * *

I will begin by making the broad assertion that no man having republican proclivities or sentiments can acquire or hold any social position in Georgia; that whenever and wherever it is known that a man is a republican, that man is at once proscribed and ostracized by every democratic element, whether found in male or female.

In 1872 I dared to run for Congress in opposition to the nominee of the democratic party. Up to that date my social position in the city of Americus was as high as that of any other citizen. I and my family were invited to all public and private entertainments. Since then we have been pointedly left out in the "cold," and the only reason assigned for it was, that I was a candidate for Congress on the Grant ticket and supported by republicans; but the "feather that broke the camel's back" occurred last summer, when I was nominated by the republican party of my district for Congress. This circumstance alone made my ostracism as perfect as that of Horace Greeley would have been had he gone to Georgia twenty-five years ago. At no moment when out of my office or away from my hotel did I feel that my life was worth a baubee. Threat after threat was received of assassination, riding on rails, and tar and feathers. The entire press of the State heaped abuse and anathemas upon me, and why? Simply because I had accepted the republican nomination. Yet Senators have the hardihood to assert that all is "serene" in Georgia, that republicans are free and untrammeled in the expression of their political opinions, that they enjoy every cardinal principle of constitutional government.

At midnight after my nomination scores and scores of democrats came to my hotel and serenaded me with tin pans, bass drums, tin horns, pieces of old sheet iron, &c., applying to me every kind of insulting epithets. These people were permitted thus to insult justice and right undisturbed by a vigilant police, and the next day were discharged by the mayor of the city when arraigned for disorderly conduct. On the same night these democrats went to the house of B. F. Bell, a republican, with their tin pans and other discordant instruments, serenaded and abused him for being a damned radical in the presence and hearing of a sick wife.

In my district there are between twenty-one and twenty-three thousand voters, and my opponent conceded that the republicans had twenty-five hundred majority; yet there were only between twelve and thirteen thousand votes polled in the entire district, and why? Because the republicans were not permitted or allowed to vote. It was the policy and plan of the democrats not to open the polls at any precinct remote from the court-house precincts where there was a predominance of republican voters, (there being no law in Georgia to compel any person or persons to open the polls.) For instance, at Danville, in my county, and sixteen miles from the court-house, I had requested a large number of my party to assemble for the purpose of voting. The magistrates and other men who were to manage the election, all democrats, delayed the opening of the polls under one pretext and another until three o'clock p. m., the hour for closing the polls in country precincts in Georgia. Then these fair-dealing men would announce it was too late to have an election. It was also too late for the colored republicans to walk sixteen miles to the court-house, but the democrats would mount their horses and gallop to town in time to vote, and, after getting there, boast of their great feat of swindling me out of two or three hundred votes. At Antioch and Florence, in the county of Stewart, I lost one thousand votes in the same way. At Sumterville, in Lee County; at Lick Skillet, in Schley County; and Harrell, in Pulaski, and other country precincts, ranging from sixteen to twenty miles from their respective court-houses, hundreds and hundreds of republicans were deprived of their ballots in the manner heretofore described. For this reason there was a small vote polled in Georgia, and for this reason and others that I will hereafter mention I was defeated for Congress.

In the city of Americus, where I live, there was but one place of voting. The ballots were handed to managers through a window. In front of this window the colored voters formed a line and stood throughout the entire day like a stone wall, each one waiting for his turn to vote. The democrats did everything in their power to break their line and scatter them. For instance, they would go among them puffing tobacco smoke in their faces, snatching tickets from them, throwing cayenne pepper among them, pursuading, begging, and trying to bribe them to vote the democratic ticket. At least half of the colored voters were challenged, the challengers asking all kinds of silly questions, such as "Are you old enough to vote?" when perhaps the voter was fifty years old. "Have you paid your tax?" when the voter actually had his tax-receipt in his hand. "Havn't you got some other name?" and other foolish questions. Indeed, everything was done to delay voting on the part of republicans and kill time until six o'clock. The consequence was scores and scores of colored voters went away without voting, thinking that six o'clock would come before they would have a chance to present their ballots. On the other hand, democratic voters were received by the managers without a moment's hesitation, and there was no democrat challenged or required to show his tax-receipt during the day. My nephew was afraid to vote for me, because he was told that it would injure his business. The employers of my son-in-law were asked and implored by many democrats to discharge him because he voted for me. Many old customers of the house actually declared they would never patronize the house while my son-in-law was connected with it. His whole sin consisted in voting for his father-in-law, as he is and always has been a democrat.

During last September Captain H. L. French (an employé in a large dry-goods store) declared himself an independant candidate for the State senate. His employers told him plainly that they would discharge him if he dared to run against the democratic nominee. Thus the senator from my district was permitted to walk over a course where the republican majority was from twelve to fifteen hundred.

The day after my nomination for Congress Dr. McLeod left my hotel declaring that he could not stay in the same house with a republican. Another boarder (Mrs. Dr. Burt) requested the landlady to provide her another table as she could not sit and eat at the same table with radicals. The result was that a table had to be provided exclusively for my family.

In my town I could give circumstance after circumstance, example after exemple, by way of illustrating the intense hatred of democrats toward white republicans, and showing the utter and complete proscription of the latter, but I will close the scene on my county after adding that on the second night after the election I was insulted in every conceivable way. The democrats had a torch-light procession, and through transparencies I was caricatured as a hog, an ass, and in various other ways and forms, the whole thing ending by burning me in effigy. Yet, according to the speeches of some men in Washington, Georgia is a free country where every man, of whatever political hue, can express his sentiments undisturbed and unmolested.

On the day of election, in the county of Taylor, the tax-collector refused to receive poll-tax from colored voters who tendered the money, thereby depriving them of their legal right to vote.

In the county of Macon, at the October election, the tax-collector was requested by democrats to close his books and cease receiving poll-tax from colored voters, thereby depriving scores and scores of republicans from voting. In the same county, at Oglethorpe, one colored man was not permitted to vote because he was more than fifty years old. At Marshallsville, in the same county, a number of colored men who had been residents of the county from two to five months, and who were born in the State and never out of it, were not permitted to vote because they had not been in the county six months, when the law only requires thirty days. These men had lived in the district for years.

In the county of Pulaski, where the republicans number more than one thousand, I received but thirty-two votes. They went to the court-house town for the purpose of voting, but democrats threatened the lives of all men who voted for me, and otherwise intimidated them. Mr. King, the only white republican in the county, advised them not to vote, but to go quietly to their respective homes. In this way hundreds and hundreds of colored republicans were deprived of their right of suffrage at Hawkinsville. In the same county, W. S. Bush, a white republican from the neighboring county of Wilcox, was waylaid, beaten, and prevented from making a speech before the election.

The foregoing pages refer entirely to my district, and I could go on and elaborate at great length, giving other circumstances and facts showing the utter falsity of the assertion that we have quiet and fair elections in Georgia; that peace and harmony prevail there; but time and space admonish me to stop. The most of the facts thus far stated have come within my knowledge and personal experience, and the others are derived from sources whose truthfulness and genuineness I cannot doubt. Therefore I hold myself, to any man, at any time and place, responsible for their utterance.

Respectfully submitted.

JACK BROWN.

General JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Illinois will yield the floor, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield, for I am quite weak and feeble, and I will take the floor in the morning to conclude my remarks if I shall then be able to do so.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before putting the question on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Chair will present a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 4306) to place Lawrence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, upon the retired list of the Army, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONDITION OF AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, presented from the Committee on Education and Labor a report in regard to the condition of the agricultural colleges of the United States; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

EMPLOYÉS IN STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with section 194 of the Revised Statutes, a report of the names of the clerks and all other persons employed in the State Department or in any of its offices during the year 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of deficiencies in the appropriations required by the various Departments for completing the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with section 262 of the Revised Statutes, a detailed statement of the expenditures from the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of December 22, 1874, a detailed statement of all the expenditures of the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COAST-RANGE INDIANS, OREGON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill for the removal of the Coast-range Indians from the Siletz and Alsea reservations in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. KASSON. The Speaker will pardon me for interrupting the business, as my committee is in session and my presence is required there. I only desire to have the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874, which is merely verbal, concurred in by the House, and the bill disposed of. The Senate has substituted the word "approved" for the word "passed." It is a mere verbal amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to taking the Senate bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. KASSON. It is only a verbal amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand; but the civil-rights bill cannot lie there while every other business is taken up and disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. The only effect of delaying the bill will be to obstruct the course of justice in New York, where it is desired in pending suits.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am sorry for the gentleman's bill, but I must object.

SPRINGFIELD BREECH-LOADING RIFLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to royalty upon the Allen and Springfield breech-loading rifle and metallic cartridges; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS AT LAW OF MATHIEU ALEXIS DE ROCHEFERMOIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of the heirs at law of Mathieu Alexis De Rochefermois; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an amendment to the appropriation for subsistence of the Ute Indians in Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NEW SAFE FOR THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for the purchase of a new safe for the use of the disbursing clerk of his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. LYON & SON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill providing for the payment of the claim of William P. Lyon & Son for printing one thousand volumes of the Choctaw laws; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES AT THE SPRINGFIELD ARMORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of April 2, 1874, a statement exhibiting the expenditures of the Springfield Armory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting various surveys; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MORGAN'S LOUISIANA AND TEXAS RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report in the case of the refusal of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad Company to transport military supplies and troops for the United States over said railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the lands required for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 23, 1874, reports of the examination and survey of certain rivers and harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 11, 1874, a report showing the receipts and expenditures of the Louisville and Portland Canal from June 11 to December 31, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill to provide for the consolidation of certain bands and tribes of Indians in Washington Territory, and for the sale of certain reservations in said Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSISTENCE FOR THE CHEYENNES AND OTHER INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations for the subsistence and support of the Cheyenne, Arapaho, Apache, Kiowa, Comanche, and Witchita Indians in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1853, a statement showing the number and names of persons employed in the Coast Survey during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RENT FOR BUILDINGS USED IN PUBLIC SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in reply to the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, relative to the payment of rent for buildings used for public services during the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Without printing.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not know about that. It appears to me that those things ought to go into print.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think this will, but in the form of a report by the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. If all is to be printed, well and good; but if only such parts are to be printed as the committee see fit to embody in their report, that is a different thing.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will all be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee move that the communication be printed?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not insist upon it if the chairman of the Committee on War Claims will give an assurance that it shall all be ultimately printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will be if I can get the opportunity of making a report and having it printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the communication to be printed.

CREEK ANNUITIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an appropriation for Creek annuities; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN TRIBES IN NORTHERN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of a bill to amend the act of June 10, 1872, for the relief of certain Indian tribes in the northern superintendency; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

M. FAUST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill of M. Faust, contractor, for grading and graveling street and sidewalks in front of Indianapolis arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CAMP COOK MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the Camp Cook military reservation, in Shasta County, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MOVABLE HYDRAULIC GATES AND DRAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to a report upon the applicability of movable hydraulic gates and draws to the improvement of the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENTS TO LAND-GRANT RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 13, 1874, in relation to sums of money paid to certain land-grant railroad companies for the transportation of troops and property of the United States transported since the 1st day of January, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the order to print include the printing of the volume which accompanies the communication?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. RANDALL. That is very important information, which will probably lead to the saving of a great deal more than the cost of printing.

Mr. GARFIELD. All right.

MERCHANDISE SMUGGLED THROUGH THE MAIL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 22, 1874, in relation to the smuggling of merchandise through the mail; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE MINNESOTA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 23, 1866, a report of the result of the examination and survey of the Minnesota River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON FORT RANDALL MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation," approved May 18, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to know if that report, including a draught of a bill, has the effect of introducing the bill into the House?

The SPEAKER. What would be the gentleman's point of order if it were?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose it is not a bill introduced into the House.

The SPEAKER. If the matter is referred to the committee, they could found a bill on the report.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. But this practice would allow a Secretary of one of the Departments or any Bureau officer to introduce and refer a bill into the House in this way.

The SPEAKER. It is a very common practice for the Departments to send the draught of a bill, which the committee can use or not as they please. They may take this bill or any other draught of a bill they please.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is nothing more than what any citizen may do by petition.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will the bill be treated as if it had been referred by the House?

The SPEAKER. O, no; nothing of that sort.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the estimate of appropriation heretofore submitted to the House for the continuance of the geological surveys; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LOAN FOR BENEFIT OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an act of the Cherokee legislature authorizing a loan to be negotiated for their benefit; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ABSENT SHAWNEES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claims of absent Shawnees and other Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DESCRIPTIVE ANATOMICAL CATALOGUE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 1831, to provide for printing at the Government Printing Office one thousand copies of the descriptive anatomical catalogue of the Army Medical Museum; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION ON THE STAFF OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the repeal of the law which forbids promotion on the staff of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUBURN, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the erection of a public building at Auburn, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

DRAUGHTSMEN FOR QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, asking an appropriation for two draughtsmen in the Quartermaster-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY PRISONERS AT FORT LEAVENWORTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a special estimate of the fund required for military prisoners at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for the year ending June 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill in relation to the Malheur reservation in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the removal of certain Indians to a Government reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CUT THROUGH RED FISH BAR, GALVESTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the completion of a cut nine feet deep and one hundred and fifty feet wide through Red Fish Bar, Galveston, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Coast Survey for the year 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting revised estimates of appropriation for the continuation of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY OF FEBRUARY 22, 1857.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the treaty of February 22, 1857, with the Creek tribe in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 24, 1872, sundry claims for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HARBORS OF NEW BEDFORD AND NANTUCKET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 23, 1874, a report on the survey of the harbors of New Bedford and Nantucket, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 16, 1874, a schedule of claims under the act of July 4, 1864, examined and allowed since June 30, 1874. The schedule refers to the claims embraced in this large package of papers.

Mr. RANDALL. What character of claims?

The SPEAKER. The Chair imagines they are war claims. If there be no objection, they will be referred to the Committee on War Claims without being printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the Speaker to have the goodness to withhold the last batch of papers until we can look at the act.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a schedule of the claims, be printed, and that the accompanying papers be referred to the committee, with power to direct their printing if they deem it necessary.

Mr. MAYNARD. My suggestion is to withhold the papers until to-morrow morning, until we can have time to examine the act.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so, and not lay them before the House at this time.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4310) to establish a board of public works; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KILLINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4311) for the relief of Henry C. Parry, late assistant surgeon of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCE AND TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4312) to promote commerce among the States and cheapen the transportation of persons and property between the Atlantic sea-board and the Western States and Territories; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the statement of Mr. Thomas A. Scott and Judge Baker before the House Committee on the Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LANGDON C. EASTON.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4313) to correct the date of commission of Colonel Langdon C. Easton, of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA HOWARD POWERS.

Mr. SMALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back House bill No. 4122, and the accompanying papers, for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers; and moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTY-FIRST PARALLEL RAILROAD.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of J. K. Hornish, in relation to the construction of the Forty-first Parallel Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN IOWA.

Mr. McCRARY. I have been requested to introduce a bill relative to certain lands in the State of Iowa. I have not examined the bill, and do not wish to be considered as responsible for what it may contain.

No objection was made; and the bill (H. R. No. 4314) was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

THE SEA-PORTS OF THE WORLD.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4315) to authorize the purchase of copies of a certain maritime publication, The Sea-Ports of the World, for use in the public service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ISLAND OF NAVASSA.

Mr. COX. I ask consent to submit an adverse report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee was called yesterday, but I was out of my seat. I am instructed by the committee to report back House bill No. 4059, relative to the ownership of the island of Navassa, and to move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL CALLOTY.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. PAGE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4318) concerning naturalization; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT ATTORNEYS.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4319) to prevent persons formerly in the Patent-Office from prosecuting applications for patents, &c., therein; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a privileged question.

TOLL-ROAD IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged question which comes over from yesterday. When the House adjourned on yesterday it had under consideration House bill No. 3051, granting the right of way over the public lands for a toll-road in Little Cottonwood Cañon, Utah Territory. The question was upon the motion to reconsider the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. The third reading of an engrossed bill.

The bill was then read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. FINCK. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 126, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Bradley, Bundy, Burrows Roderick R. Butler, Carpenter, Cessna, Chittenden, Clements, Stephen A. So the bill was not passed.

Mr. FINCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass the bill; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] rises to submit a motion with reference to a communication laid before the House yesterday from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 14, 1874, in relation to alleged changes in the laws imposing duties on imports, or new constructions of such laws made by his Department. This communication was, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] representing the Committee on Ways and Means, desires that that reference be reconsidered with the view of having the communication sent to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WOOD. The Committee on Ways and Means have instructed me to move a reconsideration of the vote by which this communication was referred to the committee of which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] is chairman. It is a communication in answer to a resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, referring exclusively to the administration of the tariff laws since June 22, 1874. It is full of facts and statistics, together with instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury to collectors of the several ports of the United States. The information which it contains is necessary for the Committee on Ways and Means in connection with several bills upon the subject, which have been referred to them. I am directed therefore to move that the vote referring the communication to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be reconsidered in order that the communication may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. So that both committees may have the benefit of it.

Mr. POLAND. In the first place I desire to be acquitted of any charge of discourtesy to the Committee on Ways and Means; because before I moved the reference of this communication to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and had his assent to that reference.

Now a word in relation to the propriety of that reference. A certain gentleman in New York, inasmuch as the Committee on the Revision refused to receive about one thousand amendments of the law that he desired to propose, has ever since the passage of that revision been busily at work through the New York press and other journals of the country to charge that the Committee on the Revision had made a great many changes with reference to the rates of duties upon a variety of things. The New York press has teemed with his articles on this subject, and the general impression has been created in the country that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, either through ignorance or some worse motive, made a variety of changes in reference to the tariff laws. Now that there are some errors in the revision—printers' errors, errors in copying, errors of omission—we acknowledge. That the work is perfect the committee do not claim, and they are carefully going over it for the very purpose of correcting every possible error. The whole point of this resolution was to ascertain from the Secretary of the Treasury whether changes had been made in the rates of duty collected upon various articles in consequence of errors in the revision or changes of law made in that revision. Now as the committee are going over the revision for the very purpose of correcting every possible error that may be found in it and making it conform entirely to the existing law, it is perfectly appropriate and right that this communication should go to our committee, so that we may have information whether there is any change of the law or not. If this were a question of raising or lowering duties, of taking off duties or putting them on, I quite agree that we would have no business with it; it would belong to the Committee on Ways and Means. But the whole point of this inquiry and of this communication is whether the revision of the laws has changed the rates of duty or not, and I think it properly belongs to our committee.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Vermont has alluded to a conference he had with me. When this paper came in he stated to me substantially what he has stated to the House. I told him I did not know what my committee might desire about it, but that it seemed to me the reason which he gave made it proper the communication should go to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws rather than to the Committee on Ways and Means. This was a matter which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] had in charge; but I told the gentleman from Vermont so far as I was concerned I would be glad to have his committee take charge of it. I did not intend, however, by anything I said to give the assent of my committee to its reference to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The Committee on Ways and Means this morning directed the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to move a reconsideration, as they desired this information referred to them.

While I am upon the floor I desire to say that as this is a matter which was initiated by the Committee on Ways and Means, they feel by right the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury should be referred to them.

I have had the same experience with this gentleman in New York as the gentleman from Vermont. He set out when the laws were being revised with a book containing nearly one thousand amendments and changes of the law, which he insisted upon getting made through the Committee on Ways and Means or through the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. We got out of all patience with him, and finally he was told by the Committee on Ways and Means and by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws that the purpose of the revision was not to alter the laws. He came back to my committee this winter, complaining of changes which he tried himself to effect. He came here complaining there were changes made which he himself tried to have made, at least a thousand of them. I was very glad, therefore, for one, to get this thing off my hands, and I did tell the gentleman from Vermont, so far as I was concerned, the communication might go to his committee. I hope my committee will not accuse me of being disloyal or trying to give away any of its prerogatives.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] should be exceedingly sensitive on this question, as it pertains to a matter in reference to which he has been very much censured, inasmuch as it has been discovered very material alterations have been made in the rates of duties imposed upon foreign goods imported into the United States. I feel a degree of interest in everything pertaining to this question, and I think the gentleman has entirely misunderstood the purpose of the resolution adopted by the House at the instance of the Committee on Ways and Means. This communication is in reply to that resolution which called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report the facts. It makes no criticism of the revision of the statutes. We wanted to know under what law the Secretary assumed the responsibility of changing the tariff when there has been no tariff legislation since 1872. Merchants in New York have found there have been material additions of duties imposed. They have complained to the Treasury Department, and we are told that it has been in consequence of the revision of the laws and in consequence of construction put by the Treasury Department upon that revision of the laws. Therefore the resolution was adopted for the purpose of procuring this information from the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no doubt he has given it to us fully in this communication. As the Committee on Ways and Means asked for it, as it is desired by that Committee in reference to questions pending before it, as it relates to whether there has been any change in the law or not, and is not in reference to correction of errors in the revision of the laws, I take it for granted it should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I have no doubt the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is fully able to make whatever corrections may be necessary in the revision of the laws.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call attention to the effect of the resolution in which I co-operated with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] It went beyond the errors so called of the revision of the laws. It may be said to have overlooked those errors of revision. It asked the Secretary of the Treasury whether, because of the revision of the laws or because of the change of construction, he has made any change in the rates of duty, or whether any have been made by his advice or direction. It went altogether beyond the scope of the revision of the laws, and therefore it is the Committee on Ways and Means have felt an anxiety to get this paper before them. They desire to act upon it independently of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It is necessary for them to have it printed at as early a date as may be possible. When printed, of course the Committee on the Revision of the Laws will have access to any part of it they may want.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let me say a word. There is something more in this case than is indicated by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I do not think all the trouble in the newspapers about this matter originated with the gentleman from New York, to whom they have referred. While he might have wished to be a legislator and sought to effect certain purposes growing out of his theories, there are persons in the city of New York who have a large moneyed interest in the questions propounded by the resolution of the House, to which this communication is an answer. There are in the Treasury Department some fifteen or twenty thousand appeal cases. There is a single law firm in the city of New York who probably have charge of ten thousand of these cases. I understand the process by which appeals are taken is for the members of this law firm, who are familiar with that kind of practice, to go to the merchant who has paid his customs dues or before he has paid them, and advise him to take an appeal, and they will take the matter into their own hands and give him no further trouble about it. If they succeed, they get one-half of the refund, and the merchant gets the other half and has no trouble about it. And so in almost every case where there is the slightest possibility or chance for the rule of the collector of customs to be wrong these appeals are taken, and they are now piled up to the amount of some fifteen or twenty thousand in the Secretary's office; and the whole amount of money dependent on these decisions is from three to four million dollars. Now, I do not wish to make any remark that would injure the credit of this firm.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] ought to say there that it is in consequence of this revision affecting the tariff that these evils to which he refers have arisen.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that when the gentleman comes to examine the subject in his committee he will find he is mistaken about that. I am perfectly willing this should go to his committee—I do not care to which committee it goes—I only want that it shall be carefully examined.

I do not wish to make any insinuations either against the honesty of this firm of brokers as they are called, customs brokers, or against anybody in the Treasury Department. Everybody who has suffered from unjust charges will be extremely cautious in making them against others. I know that there is a near kindred existing between one of those gentlemen, who has a very large proportion, probably one-half of all these appeal cases, and an officer whose duty it is in some respects to decide upon them in the Treasury Department. The rulings, perhaps, have been more firm latterly than they used to be. And there comes the complaint. When these bills were presented to the Treasury Department formerly a great many of them slipped through, and refunds to a large amount were made of which Congress knew nothing and for which there was no special appropriation, and were divided between the merchants and different brokers. Lately, since the gentleman now in charge of that Department has come in, a more rigid examination of these cases and perhaps something that may appear to be an overturning to some extent of cases that have formerly slipped through without much advisement, have taken place; and it is in this that all this trouble which has called the attention of the gentleman from New York to the matter has originated; and I know, if he finds it to be so when he comes to examine the whole thing, he will feel like me, that the law has not been changed either by the rulings of the Department or by the revision, but that there has been a more thorough administration of the law.

Mr. KASSON. That is precisely what we want to find out by the report on this communication.

Mr. WOOD. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I was not on the floor of the House when this subject was opened this morning; but, as having some practical knowledge of it, I wish to say in a very general and also in a very emphatic way that if there is any department of this Government or of the civil service of this Government which requires inquiry and reform, it is the administration of the existing tariff laws at the New York custom-house. I do not hesitate to say that the complications, the confusion, and the difficulties which are there patent to every merchant, and which are inseparable from our present system, are a disgrace to the Government, and the revision or codification of the tariff laws here at the last session has but intensified that disgrace. It is the last straw, sir, that will break the camel's back. And any party that resists inquiry, investigation, and reform in respect to the embarrassments arising from our existing and confused tariff will find, or will deserve to find, its winding sheet in that resistance.

I believe that my colleague has proposed an inquiry (if the resolution he offered be the same as he showed me a few days ago) that touches the marrow of the subject, and I call upon gentlemen here to permit the inquiry to go on. This is something which cannot be much longer concealed or evaded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say a word upon this subject, because there has been referred to the Judiciary Committee a bill intended to correct some of these abuses. I think I shall not be charged with having any particular interest or bias toward the merchants of New York or elsewhere who are engaged in importing—certainly not by some of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means; I have thought that a goodly number of them were no better than editors—sometimes. But I think that the law as it stands—and it is not the fault of the revision of the law, which only brings the laws together—has thrown around the honest merchant so many hampers, so many legal technicalities, so many difficulties, through which he has got to pass in order to get his case before the courts, that there is a necessity for some legislation. A sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee are trying to perfect that legislation, and we will soon have it ready to report to the House. I am one of those who hold that while the laws against fraudulent merchants should be made of the utmost stringency and the penalties of the utmost severity, and every means taken by which they may be brought to justice, yet when an honest merchant tries to pay his duties honestly and fairly everything should be done by which he may have full opportunity to present his case to the courts of his country.

Now, that much I have taken the liberty to say, lest what my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has said may prejudice the bill when it is reported. The very trouble has been that there has been no way of getting by a ruling of the collector until a large amount of wrong has been done and all these appeals piled up. And if what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] says is correct, and I do not doubt it, if there are twenty thousand cases now pending in the Treasury Department which by law ought to be decided and which the law provided should be decided within ninety days after the appeal was taken, where merchants claim they have been overtaxed when trying honestly to pay the duties, it is a disgrace to the administration of the law. We have no right to have three or four million dollars locked up in the Treasury about which there is a question; but as the first step in deciding the question as to who it belongs to has not been taken, I hope some committee—and if no other committee does it we of the Judiciary Committee will try it—will provide for a judicial investigation into these matters.

Mr. DAWES. It may be a great misfortune to lock up three or four million dollars in the Treasury until we are certain as to whom it belongs, or until we get a proper construction of law; but it strikes me that it is quite as wrong to let the money run out of the Treasury, on the decision of a subordinate officer of the Treasury, without any knowledge on the part of the legislative body. The Treasury Department, having been called upon by the House, through the Committee on Ways and Means, to furnish information in reference to this refund, made a statement here which comprised their whole knowledge; they revised their statement in a few days to the amount of $500,000, and they did not know to what extent refunds were being made at the custom-house in New York under the law. The Committee on Ways and Means tried last session to provide that when money comes into the Treasury of the United States, it shall, as the Constitution provides, never come out of it except by appropriations by Congress.

Now, I agree with my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] that there are many complications surrounding the honest administration of the customs laws, about which the honest merchant has a great right to complain, and that they are more vexatious and burdensome than the duties themselves, and have brought the tariff duties more into odium than the duties themselves. But, sir, if these merchants have cause of complaint, the fault lies at their own door. The Committee on Ways and Means, ever since I have been a member of it, have been importuning the merchants who complain of the complex and intricate laws now existing and are willing to pay honest duties to put on paper their complaints, to write out the law just as they want it administered, and then our committee would consider it. But, sir, we get nothing from the men who complain but complaints; we get no advantage from their experience; we get nothing but complaints on the one side and devices to evade duties on the other, in the manner to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention. Sir, I sought during the recent recess to find out from these men where the complaint was and where was the remedy. I know that my colleague and the Committee on the Judiciary know all about the customs laws and all about the administration of the customs laws, but the Committee on Ways and Means do not know much about it, I confess. They find it a very intricate subject. They find reason to believe that what the gentleman from New York has said is true, and they have attempted themselves and this House has assisted them in the effort to restrain abuses.

But that does not touch the question before the House now, which is whether the rulings which have been made under a new administration of the Treasury Department are actual changes in the law or changes merely in its administration. That is the only question involved in this resolution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to say a word. The Committee on the Judiciary do not claim any more knowledge of the administration of the customs laws than the Committee on Ways and Means has, but we do claim that when there is a law upon the statute-book we know what that law is; and when the decision of the courts is one way in one part of the country and another in the other part of the country, and there is a third decision by the Treasury Department, we think we know how to bring those divers decisions together, and we have never felt obliged to ask any merchant or anybody else to draw any bill for us. We have never come before the House and explained to them that we have not done our duty because some merchants have not drawn a bill for us. When they do so we give such bills just consideration; but I understand that it is the business of the committee to draw the bill itself.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody asked the committee to draw a bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that the complaint of my friend was that the merchants should draw a bill. Am I right?

Mr. DAWES. No; you are not right. We asked these gentlemen to put their complaints on paper, so that we might see them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And you said you asked them to draw a bill such as they wanted. I appeal to the RECORD.

Mr. DAWES. I may have said so; your ears are better than mine. I only say I did not intend to say so.

Mr. WOOD. I did not anticipate a discussion of so wide a range as this appears to have assumed, upon the question of a reference merely of a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] has made some remarks which in my judgment are not exactly fair to the merchants of New York; therefore, I desire to say a word in their defense. But for those remarks I should not prolong this discussion.

There are probably no persons in the United States who are so much oppressed as the merchants of New York; first, by the legislation of Congress, secondly, by the administration of the Treasury Department, and thirdly, by the subordinate officials at the custom-house in New York whose duty it is to execute the laws under the directions and instructions of the Treasury Department. And when in addition to these decisions of the Treasury they find suddenly, after they have ordered large importations of foreign merchandise, that new instructions and new duties are imposed in the absence of legislation by Congress, I submit that they have a right to complain.

The merchants of our port are paying into the Treasury of the United States three-fourths of all the revenues of the country derived from duties levied upon foreign goods. We do not complain of that. We cheerfully contribute this large amount to the necessities of the Government. But we do ask to be treated as fairly as any other department of industry in the United States, be it in the South, the West, the North, or the East. Sir, the merchants of New York are gentlemen of the very highest personal reputation and character. They are struggling simply for justice. When they find themselves thus injured they do complain. By this revision of the statutes alterations have been made affecting individual firms in New York to the amount of three-quarters of a million dollars. And when they complain, in some instances they have been referred to this revision of the laws, in others referred back to the collector, and in other instances referred to the old law, and the new instructions given under the new régime of the Treasury Department.

It is for this reason that we desire to have investigated the facts in this case. We desire to find out whether the fault is in the administration or in the new law. We desire to have this subject considered with all the care its importance demands, not only its importance to the Treasury of the United States which is materially affected, but also to the personal interest of the merchants of New York. I hope, therefore, that my motion to change this reference from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to the Committee on Ways and Means may be adopted by the House. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. The House will remember that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws used to meet here after sundown, week after week. We had the most implicit faith that they would make no change in the laws, only revise. Indeed, that was their province and duty; only this and nothing more. There was a subdivision of this committee; there was a division of responsibility. And to show this House now how singularly some part of that work was done, I will show what occurred by stating in the first place what occurred before our Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning. I suppose it is proper to make that statement as the committee authorized a bill to be reported. The Committee on Revision in the portion of the laws relative to naturalization actually struck out the word "white."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Let me correct the gentleman; the committee did not strike it out.

Mr. COX. Then why the bill reported this morning on that subject?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I thought my friend did not seem to understand the matter in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I presume he does not in the House.

Mr. COX. There is a bill authorized to be reported on the subject. It forbids the naturalization of Chinese, when under this peculiar revision it was thought that they were to be naturalized. That is all owing to the awkward way in which this revision was made. I know that is right, and the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] knows that I am right, for he introduced a bill to correct that irregularity.

But the point to which I wish to call attention particularly is that which concerns the commerce of New York. We collect at that port three-quarters of the revenue derived from duties on imports, as my colleague [Mr. WOOD] has said. That tax in the last resort comes from the consumers of the country. Did any one expect that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws would modify or increase any of the tariff rates beyond what was collected or enforced in December, 1873? I appeal to the RECORD for that. With this all the members of this House will agree. Yet in matters of ambiguity, or doubt, in regard to a large number of imported articles, the decision of the Treasury is, that because of that revision increased or other duties should be levied. Am I right about that? Will any one dispute that? I hold in my hand a statement of the New York Times. It contains a careful collation in respect to various articles.

Mr. POLAND. Do you know who wrote it? I do.

Mr. COX. It is written by the editor of that paper. It is editorial. I do not care who wrote it, if it is true.

Mr. POLAND. It is not true.

Mr. COX. Then let the gentlemen on the Committee on Ways and Means ascertain that fact. For that reason I would refer it to that committee. The statement relates to manufactures of silk and cotton; to manufactures of flax and cotton; to linen goods; to cotton book-binding muslin; to books, photographs, labels, printed matter, argols, castile-soap, spirit, cotton lace, &c. More than fifteen or twenty different articles are enumerated in that statement upon all of which the duties have been modified or increased. I will ask to have this list printed in order that the Committee on Ways and Means may be enabled to examine it. It is not long.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. In case of conflicting decisions by the district courts, and a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States reconciling those conflicting decisions, which decision is to be taken as the law of the land? That statement from the New York Times is made up upon decisions of the district courts which have been adjudicated and overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States; and the revision is in almost every instance in harmony with the final decision.

Mr. COX. Now, I want to ask my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who ever authorized the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, after our understanding that they would not modify or increase tariff rates, to take into consideration any decisions of the courts on that subject?

Mr. KELLEY. Were they not bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. COX. I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the House that no man and no set of men were authorized, morally or legally, in that revision to change the tariff in one particular.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee did not change it.

Mr. COX. If you are aggrieved by the decisions of the courts, go back to the courts and have the question readjudicated properly, if you can.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman complains that the committee did not take the conflicting decisions of local courts—district courts or circuit courts. The committee referred to the decisions of the Supreme Court to ascertain what the law was, and put it in as decided by that court.

Mr. COX. Before the end of the session we shall see whether the gentlemen on the other side can raise the tariff by indirection. We will see whether, in this insidious mode, the complex and onerous tariff can be made worse. The people are interested in low taxation.

The article in the New York Times to which I have referred is as follows:

We have, however, taken pains to inquire at authentic sources, and we find that since June 22, 1874, rates of duty have been increased in the following instances among others, and we think it will be agreed that this increase requires explanation. If the language of former statutes was ambiguous, but the Treasury had declared an interpretation in which the country acquiesced, why did Mr. POLAND'S committee change that interpretation in face of its pledges? Or if the language of the revision was left of doubtful significance, why did Secretary Bristow, after the promises of the committee, which became in good morals a part of the law, exact the higher instead of the lower rates, and thereby make the duty higher than that enforced on the 1st of December, 1873?

Description of articles.	Rates enforced by the Treasury December 1, 1873.	Rates enforced by the Treasury since June 22, 1874.
Manufactures of silk and cotton, of which cotton is chief value*.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	50 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Manufactures of flax and cotton, cotton chief value†.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	5½ cents per square yard, 20 per cent. less 10 per cent.
Linen damasks, linen coatings, linen drills, linen blay, linen brown hollands, costing under 30 cents per square yard.	30 per cent.	35 per cent.
Do., costing over 30 cents per square yard.	35 per cent.	40 per cent.
Cotton book-binding muslins‡	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	5½ cents per square yard, 20 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Lining cottons and tarletans, weighing less than 5 ounces to the square yard.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	5½ cents per square yard and 20 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Worsted embroideries, embracing slipper-patterns, chair-seats, cushions, screens, &c§.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	50 cents per pound and 35 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Books, printed	25 per cent., less 10 per cent.	25 per cent. net.
Photographs	20 per cent.	25 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Printed music	20 per cent., less 10 per cent.	20 per cent. net.
Labels, as printed matter, now taken up as manufactures of paper.	25 per cent., less 10 per cent.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Argols, partially refined	3 cents per p'nd.	6 cents per pound.
Castile-soap	35 per cent.	1 cent per pound and 30 per cent.
Spirits, over $4 per gallon and under proof	$2 per proof gallon.	50 per cent. ad valorem.
Ale and beer in bottles	10 per cent. for breakage.	No allowance.
Spirits	Leakage, 2 per cent. allowed.	No allowance.
Fans	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.	35 per cent. net.
Cotton lace as thread	30 per cent., less 10 per cent.	35 per cent., less 10 per cent.
Linen wearing apparel	35 per cent.	40 per cent.
Lithographic stones, engraved	20 per cent.	25 per cent.
Alizarine, artificial	Free	20 per cent.
Tin plates, calf-skins, all kinds of dressed and finished skins.	On these articles there was allowed, on December 1, 1873, a reduction of 10 per cent. under the law of 1872; but this, since June, 1874, is disallowed, and on all importations since the last date the interests are reliquidated and the 10 per cent. demanded from the importer.

*Under this head is embraced a large variety of dress goods under various names, which, being low-priced, enter largely into ordinary consumption, and the importation is very large.

†The same remarks apply to these goods as to manufactures of silk and cotton.

‡The advance here is not less than 75 per cent. advance of duty.

§This gives an additional duty of nearly 60 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WOOD. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a question as to the appropriate reference of a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, pertaining to supposed errors in the revision of the laws of the United States. That being the subject-matter of the communication, it seems to me certainly due to the Committee on the Revision of the Statutes that they should first have the opportunity of examining and reporting upon the subject. I do not conceive it important to the welfare of the country or to the proper judgment of the House that the Committee on the Revision of the Statutes should be advised by the Committee on Ways and Means. I have learned pretty well, in the course of a session or two spent here, that there is not much of this House except the Committee on Ways and Means; yet I want to say, on behalf of the Committee on the Revision of the Statutes, that we have labored earnestly and faithfully in this matter; and if there are any supposed errors in the revision, it is due to the members of that committee that we should first have the opportunity of examining them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I repel the intimation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] It is not true that this whole subject-matter was simply parceled out and not examined by the committee in a body.

Mr. COX. I did not say that.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. On the contrary, while it was parceled out for special examination by particular members of the committee, no body of law was reported to this House without having first had the supervision of the entire committee as such.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the condition of the revenue laws and the laws pertaining to tariff, contained as they have been in a large number of volumes of the general laws of the United States, it has been very easy for these New York importers, (whose enemy I am not,) by the employment of shrewd attorneys and agents, who, if possible, would deceive the very elect, to get rulings from some subordinate in the Treasury Department that would place millions of dollars in their hands. These tariff laws have run through a series of about seventeen volumes. There have been all sorts of complications; and it was the work of this committee to free these laws from those complications and place the law as it now stands in a single body. Thus this revision has made many dark places plain; it has opened up to the Department a good many things which it had not before carefully examined, to which its attention had not been called. I do not know what the subject-matter of this communication is; but I undertake to say that if the Secretary of the Treasury has had the matter carefully examined, he has found that everything complained of by the New York importers has not been the result of a change in the law, but has been the result of bringing light to bear upon the dark places in the law—the result of a proper understanding and interpretation of it.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of the high-tariff system, and therefore I do not speak from that point of view. I will join the gentleman from New York and all others on this floor who are in favor of a tariff for revenue as opposed to this system of protection. But if the law as it stands upon the statute-book, as properly and fairly interpreted, is an odious law, then let Congress change it; but while it is the law of the land let it be properly enforced. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not a proper deference to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to propose that before this question shall be examined by them it shall first be revised by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] whether the Committee on the Revision of the Laws did in any particular change any law in reference to customs duties?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. We did not if we knew it.

Mr. MERRIAM. Why is it, then, that higher duties have been imposed on some articles since that revision went into operation than were imposed before?

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. If there are cases of that kind, it is simply because of a different interpretation of the law.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the impression suggested by the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, that the reference of this communication to the Committee on Ways and Means would involve a revision of the Committee on the Revision. The gentleman cannot fail to see that all allusions to the Committee on the Revision have come from outside of the Committee on Ways and Means. The Committee on Ways and Means reported a resolution designed merely to obtain from the Department a statement as to alleged changes or new constructions of the customs laws in consequence of this revision. The committee wanted this information with the view to legislation pending before them. After some weeks of delay—necessary delay no doubt—the call upon that Department is answered; and now the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, that did not desire or call for the information from the Department, ask that the communication be taken from the hands of the committee that did call for it and be referred to the Committee on the Revision. I have only to say, if that committee had called for the information for that purpose, not a member of the Committee on Ways and Means would have risen on this floor to have taken it away from them. So, in like manner, when any committee of this House calls for information touching legislation before them, I state as a principle, without exception, the House will give it to the committee which calls for it, they having jurisdiction of the pending question to which it relates. And it is solely on that ground the committee now ask for reconsideration, so this information called for by their resolution may be referred to them for their action on the pending question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I think, in justice to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, the fact ought to be brought to mind that when they were revising the laws on the subject of the tariff they made special appeal to every member of the House interested in the tariff to examine the law and report any mistake or any correction which should be made. I remember very distinctly that especially on the tariff this Committee on the Revision of the Laws called upon every member, the New York members—all interested in the tariff—to examine carefully and report any correction which should be made. There were no changes; and finally, when they get the Revised Statutes and examine them, they will find that that committee have simply conformed to a decision of the Supreme Court overruling the decision of some inferior court.

Mr. POLAND. I think the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who has made this motion to reconsider, has himself given the true reason why this communication should be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. He says the rate of duty has been changed; that there has been no tariff legislation, unless the Committee on the Revision of the Laws have made some. It is true we assured the House over and over again our purpose was not to make the slightest change in the law, and I assert here so far as the tariff is concerned we certainly did not. That was a subject in which almost everybody felt an interest, and we had more communications—we had more information in relation to that chapter from one sort of people and another than upon all the rest of the revision. The committee laid out more time and labor on that single chapter than upon all the rest of the work. I have no hesitation at all in saying there will not be in my judgment one single error found, one single case found, where we changed a law in relation to the rate of duty in any single instance.

The difficulty about the administration of the tariff laws was this: Here were a series of tariff acts running through a period of thirty years, every succeeding statute going over more or less of the ground of the previous statutes. No one of them was ever repealed. It was a work of the nicest character to determine how much of the old law was repealed and when.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, when any of these distressed gentlemen in New York were compelled to pay duties, when they wanted lower rates of duty, they applied to some collector or deputy collector or to some subordinate in the Treasury Department of an ingenious mind to go back and say, "Here is something in this old law which is not repealed; we stand on this." But when we came to wipe out the old law and give the later law its proper effect, when we came to put the tariff law or so much of the various statutes in force into a single enactment, then it became impossible to go back to these old statutes and get erroneous rulings founded upon them.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say the gentleman from New York has himself given a true reason why this should go to our committee—that there has been no legislation on the subject of the tariff unless there is new legislation in the Revised Statutes. This resolution assumes the truth of what various gentlemen in New York through the New York papers have alleged over and over again. It is not the first time I have seen the list to which my friend from New York [Mr. COX] has referred. I have seen it before. It has been charged in the New York papers I was procured to do this, that, and other things in reference to the tariff law. I say as to this subject the whole point is as to whether the revision is correct or not, and it is due to my committee, no matter who introduced this resolution, that this communication should be referred to it. The question is not who called for this information, but which is the proper committee in this House to which it should be referred. That is the question that should govern this reference, and not who introduced the resolution calling upon the Secretary to give this information. And I say, Mr. Speaker, and I believe gentlemen of this House will say that it is due to our committee, after all the allegations that have been made in the New York press upon this subject, that it should go to us to be considered by us. As we are now carefully going over all this subject to see if there are any errors in the revision and correct them, this communication bearing on that subject should go to our committee and be considered by us.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question. I understand him to say that he wants this communication, in order to find if there was an error in the revision. Can he not ascertain that by comparing it with the previous law? Is not that the way to find an error? We asked the Secretary of the Treasury if he, by a construction of law, new or otherwise, has caused a change in the rate of duties. If this is a question merely in regard to the accuracy of the revision, cannot the committee find out whether there is an error by a comparison of the new law with the old?

Mr. POLAND. I think we should be able to find out, by taking time enough, whether there is any difference between the new law and the old. But I am not so wise but I think I should discover an error sooner, if somebody who knew should point it out to me.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to say a single word, and then I shall call the previous question.

The gentleman from Vermont tells us there were no changes made in the law. Then of course this communication has no right to go to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. But we declare in the Committee on Ways and Means that there have been changes in the execution of the law affecting the tariff. This is a tariff question, a tariff inquiry, a tariff communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, who administers the tariff laws. We have bills before us to correct these errors or changes in the tariff, if there be any. Therefore I submit that there can be no doubt as to the question of reference, especially after the declaration of the gentleman from Vermont that there have been no changes in the law. The question is as to changes in the administration.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the question is, "Will the House reconsider the vote by which the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?"

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 79.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a privileged question, and move to reconsider all the references to committees made this morning. I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the special order, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Pending the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to five minutes.

The question being taken on the motion to limit debate, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not that cut off the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It does, if the House agrees to it. If the House goes into Committee of the Whole, the morning hour is destroyed for to-day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. May I inquire of the Chair on what committee the call rests in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It rests with the trustees of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is a highly meritorious institution, and I hope we shall have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That will be determined by the vote of the House on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] If the House refuses to go into the Committee of the Whole, it will be the duty of the Chair to pronounce the morning hour begun at once.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, there were ayes 91, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SENER. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent? On yesterday there came back from the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3621) abolishing the western district of Arkansas with Senate amendments, and I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and refer it, with the Senate amendments, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, from which the bill originally came.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to going to the Speaker's table for any business in advance of the civil-rights bill.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POLAND in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By a vote of the House general debate upon the bill is limited to five minutes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the practice has been not to dispense with the first reading of these bills. I think the first reading should take place.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BECK. I object.

The Clerk resumed and continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust gentlemen on the other side will not object to dispensing with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK. In the absence of some gentlemen who desired that the bill should be read, I must insist on its further reading.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that one of our reading clerks is very hoarse and it is really a very serious burden imposed upon them to require the first reading of the bill. Will the gentleman consent to take a recess of the length of time it would occupy to read the remainder of the bill? That would accomplish his purpose quite as well as by insisting on the reading.

Mr. VANCE. I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and concluded it at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The Committee on Appropriations in the preparation of this bill have endeavored to cut down the amounts to be appropriated to the lowest possible limit consistent with the good of the Indian service. The appropriation for last year was $5,680,000. The appropriation in this bill is $4,855,000, being a reduction from last year of about $825,000. The amount estimated for this year was $6,851,000, so that the committee have recommended in this bill $1,996,000, nearly $2,000,000, less than the amount recommended and asked for by the Secretary of the Interior and $825,000 less than we appropriated last year. We have endeavored in every part of this bill to cut down the appropriations to the lowest possible limit consistent with the good of the Indian service. Looking at the whole field of the Indian service, we believe that it is to-day in a more satisfactory condition than it has been at any time within the past ten years, and I may say that so far as we can ascertain by a careful and minute examination, the appropriations for this service are now used more economically than they have been at any previous time. I think that more care is taken by the Department in the transaction of the business of this branch of the service, and I think we may look forward in a few years to the time when these appropriations will be reduced to the minimum, although of course there may be, and doubtless are, instances in which wrong has been committed.

Mr. HEREFORD. I understand the gentleman to say that the committee have reduced the appropriations this year $825,000. Why, then, was there this excessive appropriation of $825,000 in the last appropriation bill? If the appropriations for this service can be reduced $825,000 this year, why could it not be done last year and that much saved to the national Treasury? Why, in other words, is the committee able to make a reduction of this amount this year when the same committee did not do it last year? I would like to know the items of reduction and in what the change consists.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I presume the gentleman has an idea that if an appropriation be less this year than it was last, there must have been fraud last year; that is a singular deduction.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not make these remarks in a factious spirit, but I think this is a matter that needs explanation. The sum of $825,000 was appropriated last year more than is appropriated this year. Why this change? Why could not the reduction be made last year by the same committee having charge of the same subject-matter?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman will attend to the reading of the bill he will see where the reduction comes in.

Mr. HEREFORD. I know I can; but why did not the Committee on Appropriations make the same reduction last year which they propose to make now?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If we do it at this time, is that not better than not doing it at all?

Mr. HEREFORD. That is not the question. If the committee could do it this year, were they not derelict in duty in not doing it last year?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. O, no; not at all. I can tell the gentleman how we do it this year. If he will look over the bill he will find that some treaties have expired which had not expired last year.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is just what I wanted to get at. How much has been saved in that way, by the expiration of treaties for which appropriations have been made in the last bill?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman will see that as we go through the bill if he attends to its reading.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate on the bill is now closed and the Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of two superintendents of Indian affairs for the central and northern superintendencies, $4,000.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out that clause. I want to begin at the beginning of this bill and see if we cannot do something in the way of retrenchment. I am in the same condition as the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] I do not understand exactly where this saving is to come in, or how the appropriations are reduced as we are told they are being reduced from year to year. The total sum recommended to be appropriated is $4,855,707.57, which is said to be a saving of $825,000 over the amount appropriated last year. I hold in my hand a book prepared at the Treasury Department, a digest of appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1875, on page 155 of which the summary gives "Indian appropriations, amount appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1875, $7,148,174.54. Now the gentleman proposes to get along with $4,855,000, and says that the appropriations of last year were only $825,000 in excess of that, when the Secretary himself furnishes Congress with a book showing that we appropriated $7,148,174.54. The Secretary of the Treasury also gives us his report at the beginning of this session. On page 4 of that report he says that the amount of expenditures for the year just closed for Indians is $6,692,462.09, nearly $2,000,000 more than the gentleman says they are now going to ask for. There has never been a year when the appropriations and expenditures have not been nearly $2,000,000 more than is now asked for. Last year the Committee on Appropriations came here with a bill for less than $5,000,000, while the actual expenditures were over $7,000,000. For the year ending June 30, 1874, the appropriations were $6,468,000, and for the year ending June 30, 1873, the appropriations were $6,633,000. The Secretary gives the figures here to show that that is the fact. Now, the truth is that we have been expending close on to $7,000,000, and sometimes $7,500,000 year by year on these Indians, while the country is led to believe that we are cutting down expenses under $5,000,000 for that purpose. There has not been a speech made in the last four years by the gentlemen presenting the Indian appropriation bill in which they have not said it was a reduction year by year. I read last spring to the House a speech made two years ago by the gentleman from California, Mr. SARGENT, then a member of the Committee on Appropriations. The books of the Treasury Department show the facts to be as I have stated.

Now, I want to know how it is that these books of the Treasury Department show that amount of expenditures in the face of the statements that we have had made here. And until I get some satisfactory explanation, I expect to keep objecting to any other appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. In the statement which I made I intended to say, if I did not say it, that the amount appropriated by the Indian appropriation bill of last year was according to the figures I stated. I do not say the entire expenditures for Indian purposes during the last year were only that amount. There are a great may expenditures or appropriations that are put by the Register of the Treasury under the head of Indian appropriations, some of which are not really money paid for the Indians. For instance, an Indian tribe has lands sold for it by the Government, and the money coming into the hands of the Government in that way is paid out for that tribe. That amount is charged in the appropriations and expenditures of that year, and it swells sometimes by millions the total of the expenditures, when really no money has been appropriated by the Government for that purpose.

I refer only to the regular appropriation bill of last year, and I repeat that this bill is $825,000 less than the corresponding bill of last year. I do not propose to go off into a general discussion of the entire amount of money expended during the year for Indian purposes. If there are any items in this bill which the gentleman thinks too large, he can move to strike them out. I think there are none.

Mr. RANDALL. I approach the discussion of this bill with a great deal of caution, because I am aware of the care taken by the gentlemen who have had charge of these bills in their preparation, and I think I know their motive to be the saving of money wherever they can. And yet my attention has been called to some things in this bill which I think should be explained; and if not explained satisfactorily, then reductions should be made. It will be observed that in the next paragraph there are sixty-nine agents provided for, the same number of agents that were provided for a year ago. There have been two new agencies established in Dakota Territory, an agency at Black Hills and the Brulé agency.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would suggest to the gentleman that when we come to the paragraph relating to agents the matter will then be appropriately before this committee for discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I will wait until that time.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. BECK to strike out the pending paragraph relating to superintendents.

Mr. BECK. I call for a division upon that question. I want to have a quorum on every vote in connection with this bill.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. I call for a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 37, noes 80.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. BECK. I insist upon a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will remain in their places. No quorum has voted. Members are requested to vote in order to make a quorum.

The tellers again reported that there were—ayes 45, noes 100.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For pay of sixty-nine agents of Indian affairs, at $1,500 each, except the one at Iowa at $500, namely.

Mr. RANDALL. Commencing where I left off before, I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that in Dakota Territory there have been established two new agences, one at Black Hills and one at Brulé. I am advised, and I think correctly, that at present there are no Indians who feed there, but they feed at Whetstone and Red Cloud agencies. Now, in order to make the number of agents the same as last year, there has been a reduction from eight to seven of the agents in the Indian Territory, as will be seen by a reference to the portion of the bill commencing at line 41, and from five to four of the agents for the tribes in New Mexico. Now I am quite content that reduction should be made. But I would like to have some reason given why we should have these two new agents in Dakota Territory, more especially when I come to consider the fact that in each of the new agencies established there is not only the cost of the expenses of another agent, but also other expenses in addition, as will be seen by reference to page 54 of this bill, lines 1320 and 1321. It will there be found that an appropriation of $10,000 is provided for the erection of buildings at Black Hills agency. If we can possibly do without the establishment of any new agencies, I think it would be wise to do so.

Now, in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs I find it stated that the entire number of Sioux is 53,000. I find also by referring back to the numbers previously given that in 1868 the aggregate number of Sioux was but 23,000; in 1869 something more than 23,000; in 1870 the same; in 1871, including wanderers, the number ran up to 31,000; in 1872 the computation made by General Walker was but 25,000; and in 1873 the number is given as 31,000. But now we have it swelled to 53,000.

My own judgment is that the Commissioner has made a mistake, and in computing the entire number of Sioux has founded his estimate upon the number of rations issued to the wild Indians. I desire, therefore, to move to strike out the word "nine" in the tenth line and insert the word "seven;" and then when we reach the clause specifying these agencies we can, in the twenty-ninth and thirtieth lines, strike out "Black Hills" and "Brulé." I propose to follow this by an amendment on the fifty-fourth page to strike out the $10,000 there provided for erecting buildings for the Black Hills agency.

Every new agency we establish costs a large amount of money. I am advised that there is really no necessity for these two new agencies; and I get this information from parties very familiar with this Indian question and the manner of appropriating money with reference to it. The Sioux in that neighborhood are now, as I have already stated, fed at the Whetstone and the Red Cloud agency. I move to amend by striking out "nine" in the pending clause and inserting "seven," so as to make the number of agents sixty-seven.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. We have been accustomed in acting upon these bills to take up each paragraph separately.

Mr. RANDALL. I wanted to notify the gentleman in making my first amendment that I intended to move a further amendment which would become necessary. For instance, I want to strike out the $10,000 appropriated on page 54 for the erection of buildings at Black Hills agency; and also, in order that different parts of the bill may be harmonious, I desire to strike out these two new agencies established in Dakota.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I suggest to the gentleman that it would be better to go on with the consideration of the bill; and if we strike out any agencies in the paragraphs in which they occur we can go back and amend this specification of the total number.

Mr. RANDALL. I am indifferent as to the manner of accomplishing my object, so that it is reached.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think that course would be better. Does the gentleman insist on his amendment now?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. I want to act in harmony with the committee who have this bill in charge.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twelve for the tribes in Dakota, namely, Red Cloud, Spotted-Tail, Yankton, Ponca, Crow Creek, Grand River, Cheyenne River, Fort Berthold, Sisseton, Devil's Lake, Black Hills, and Brulé agencies.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I suppose that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be appropriate now if he desires to offer it.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "Black Hills and Brulé." I have already stated the reasons for this amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks why it is necessary to establish these two new agencies. The trouble has been that at the Whetstone agency and the other agency referred to by the gentleman two or three classes of Indians have heretofore been fed. There has been a wild class of Indians who only come down there at feeding time; and the consequence is that they demoralize those who are further advanced in civilization. Last winter we almost had a war there because these wild Indians who came in to get provisions and supplies proposed to take them from the agent by force; and at that time we had not any military power there to protect him. Thus they were demoralizing the more peaceful Indians. Bishop Hare joins the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the agents there in recommending the establishment of these agencies. There are between seven thousand and nine thousand of these untamed Indians who will not submit to any authority of the Government except that authority which gives them provisions and supplies, which they come in and get. It has been deemed most prudent by those who have these Sioux in charge there that these wilder Indians should be fed by themselves rather than be brought down to these two other agencies where there are more civilized Indians who are disposed to submit to the authority of the Government.

Then, again, the establishment of these two agencies at the points named—at the mouth of White River on the Missouri or near there and at the foot of the Black Hills—lessens the distance that we have to transport these supplies, and there is a saving in that respect.

One remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the number of the Sioux. I believe that their true population is about thirty-seven thousand. When the gentleman takes the estimates that have heretofore been made, he should remember that as to large numbers of these people the Government in former years had no estimate and could not get any. They were back in the interior of the Black Hills. We were not feeding these wild Indians at that time, and we had no means of ascertaining the exact number. Now, it is possible that we may be mistaken as to the number of these wilder Indians. The Committee on Appropriations have sought to get as true an estimate as possible by requiring the head-men and chiefs to send in a correct statement of their numbers before receiving any supplies. We believe this requirement is working well; and we are now getting more accurately the number of Indians than we have done heretofore. But the reason that so many of these people have not been estimated in the past as are estimated at this time is that we have been feeding more of late years than we did ten or fifteen years ago. There are ten or fifteen thousand, perhaps eighteen thousand of these people, who twelve or thirteen years ago did not receive a mouthful of food from the Government. We have been trying to civilize them if possible; and we have been getting their numbers as accurately as we could, of course relying entirely in many cases upon the statements of the chiefs. They may overestimate their numbers, and perhaps they do. But the Government, acting in conjunction with the agents and everybody out there, has been trying to get the exact number of these untamed Indians who have been in the Black Hills and who heretofore have not been under the control of the Government. I think, Mr. Chairman, in the end, although it will involve the expenditure of $10,000 for buildings, still in the way of saving transportation and in the way of civilizing these Indians it is true economy to establish these two agencies.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman to one fact, in order to show how improperly we may be led in our action and how wrongly we may be impressed by mere statements in reference to the number of Indians who have been fed by the agents of the Government. At the Red Cloud agency the agent reported 9,177 as the population of Indians fed at that agency for a year, while at the same time he claimed to have issued rations at one time to as high a number as 17,000 Indians.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will say that if he will hunt up the report of the special commissioners sent out last winter he will find just how that is.

Mr. RANDALL. I will go a little further in this respect. I presume the gentleman from Missouri alludes to the testimony of Martin Gibbons. Now, if he will refer to pages 144, 145 of the report of the committee to investigate into Indian contracts, &c., in the Forty-third Congress, first session, he will find that during this very period referred to by the gentleman, Saville, the Indian agent at the Red Cloud agency, claimed to have issued on an average, during the month of October, two hundred and ninety-one head of cattle, while Gibbons, on the contrary, swears the average was only one hundred and fifty. Gentlemen can easily see how this increase in the number of agencies will facilitate the perpetration of fraud upon the Government—perhaps I might be justified in calling it, although it might not be parliamentary, intentional fraud on the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I have paid more attention this year than ever before to our Indian affairs, and I must confess, in reference to this whole Indian Department, the manner of doing business is enough to shock any man who regards the interest of the people and of the Government. For instance, there was expended during the year 1873, to which I will direct attention after a while more specifically, $800,000, without a shadow of contract, without any supervision whatever, and I propose to show at a price far exceeding usual contract prices. I want in this bill somewhere to provide some remedy, to put some stop to this unlicensed expenditure of the public money. I warn the House, and I speak from the information of men thoroughly conversant with this subject, that these two agencies are absolutely unnecessary, notwithstanding the fact which is asserted here that Bishop Hare says they are required.

But I wish to direct the attention of the committee to another fact, and that is that all these additional Indian agencies are created in a wrong direction, and as will be seen by the subsequent sections of this bill will involve large additional expenditures. I hope, therefore, that the gentlemen who have taken so much care to revise this Indian appropriation bill (and I award them praise in that direction) will permit me upon this showing to have these two agencies struck out. If they will not agree to it, I then hope the Committee of the Whole at least will consent to it. It is in the direction of economy and of honesty.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The House of Representatives and Congress must give some weight to the recommendations of the officers who have charge of Indian affairs. They have this whole subject under their care. They are sworn officers, and are presumed to recommend only what is necessary and proper. Still I believe it is perfectly right for us to examine carefully into these recommendations.

In relation to this matter, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

The establishment of an agency in the Black Hills country was recommended during the last session. Subsequent events have demonstrated the propriety of this recommendation and the necessity for such an agency in order to enable the Department to provide for the Sioux known as the wild and non-treaty Indians. Such an agency will do more to prevent their predatory incursions to the agencies now established, and to check their inclination to depredate upon white settlements, than any other measure which has presented itself to the consideration of those in charge of this subject.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Gentlemen will see this is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the board of peace commissioners, and by the commission of which Bishop Hare, one of the best men in the service, is chairman.

Mr. RANDALL. But you propose to repeal the Indian commission.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That will not be insisted on. I now ask to have read a letter from a gentleman residing in the gentleman's city of Philadelphia, in whom I have no doubt he has great confidence, and who has been connected with Indian affairs for some time past, although not now connected with them. I refer to William Welsh, a gentleman who I think is honest, and who would make no recommendation he did not deem to be correct. I believe he understands Indian affairs, so far as these Sioux Indians are concerned, better than any other man in the country. I ask his letter be read.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa will be surprised when I tell him that most of my remarks have been induced somewhat by information from the gentleman to whom he has referred. I do not know what he has to say about the Black Hills.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, November 27, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: * * * * * * *

I am thoroughly familiar with the whole matter, having been there time and again, and deem this agency one of the cheapest and best modes that can be devised by helping to civilize the wild Sioux Indians. If you will look at the close of the agent's (Dr. Livingston's) report, just published, you will see that he recommends it also. If these Indians have a separate agency, I think we can civilize them and make them self-supporting in one-tenth part of the time that it is possible to do it under present unfavorable circumstances. There will, of course, be a little additional expense for buildings, but the saving in having the eye of an agent instead of a sub-agent will soon repay the cost of buildings. The location of the new agency should be at the confluence of the White River with the Missouri. The soil is good, and a settlement can be formed that will attract many of the wild Sioux, who are giving us trouble and who visit these Lower Brulés and intermarry with them. I cannot conceive of one objection, and if you had been with me in my visits you would have seen that the continuance of the present unsettled condition of these Indians must dishearten and demoralize them, and discourage others from joining them.

The larger part of the Lower Brulés spend half the year at the mouth of the White River planting, going up to the sub-agency for their rations, then migrate when the intervening streams become impassable. It may seem to you a small, but it is a very important matter, if the board of missions that I in part represent is to promote the early civilization of the great tribes of Dakota Indians. * *

Yours sincerely,

WM. WELSH,
1122 Spruce street.

Hon. WM. LOUGHRIDGE.

Mr. RANDALL. Give me the date of that.

The CLERK. November 27, 1874.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think the gentleman will find that these agencies are really necessary for the civilization and good government of these Indians. And I think, moreover, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will find and the country will find that we will save money by having those agencies, because they will bring them nearer to navigation and the furnishing of supplies.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say a word on this amendment.

I object to the creation of any new agencies. My judgment is that one great evil, and the cause of more expenditure than anything else, is the great number of agencies we now have. You will observe on looking over the law—and I believe Indian intercourse is governed by that yet—it is known as the intercourse law with the Indian tribes, of 1834, that those agents are allowed to license persons to trade with the Indians and to revoke their licenses at pleasure, provided they are not men of good moral character or fail to give proper security. To show this I will read from section 3, which provides:

That any superintendent or agent may refuse an application for a license to trade if he is satisfied that the applicant is a person of bad character, or that it would be improper to permit him to reside in the Indian country, or if a license previously granted to such applicant has been revoked or a forfeiture of his bond decreed. But an appeal may be had from the agent or the superintendent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the President of the United States shall be authorized, whenever in his opinion the public interest may require the same, to prohibit the introduction of goods or of any particular article into the country belonging to any Indian tribe, and to direct all licenses to trade with such tribe to be revoked and all applications therefor to be rejected; and no trader to any other tribe shall, so long as such prohibition may continue, trade with any Indians of or for the tribe against which such prohibition is issued.

Those agencies are used as a means of favoritism so as to allow a few men who are the friends of the Administration to do all the trading with those Indians. Now, so far from allowing competition and allowing goods to be sold by men at the lowest prices, the fact is that at many of the leading agencies the agents, by authority from Washington, revoke the right to trade and give monopolies to particular men, refusing the same right to others. I want the committee to know that this is charged to be true, and I want to have the facts investigated that it may be known whether or not it is true. I have information on which I can rely that the right to trade at the important posts of Fort Peck and Fort Belknap, in the Territory of Montana, was revoked and the monopoly was given to the brother of the President, Orville L. Grant, who to-day is the sole licensed trader in that section of country. The Iowa delegation and others know that there are applications before the Department to see if the men who were licensed to trade before that monopoly was granted cannot make some arrangement by which they can get a reasonable amount of compensation for the goods they have already taken there.

Mr. RANDALL. The goods are made worthless by the substitution of the present holder of the right to trade.

Mr. BECK. Instead of men of good moral character being licensed to trade, the fact is to-day that at those important posts—certainly at Fort Peck and Fort Belknap—the brother of the President is the sole licensed trader. Why then should you be increasing the agencies when the leading object is to place these privileges in the hands of favored retainers and kinsmen of the Administration to the exclusion of all others, that they may use up the money here appropriated? Out of the seven millions appropriated every year for the Indians it has been proved over and over again on this floor that not more than 25 per cent. ever reaches the Indians, and that many of those agents and the traders licensed to trade with the Indians are the men who stir up strife with these Indians for the purpose of making a necessity for larger appropriations and larger supplies, so that, the monopoly being in their hands, they may make more money out of it.

There is only one way to manage the wild Indians, as experience has demonstrated, and that is through the Army of the United States. We have quartermasters and commissary-generals, and men who if they do anything wrong can be tried by court-martial and held responsible for their misdeeds, to manage those affairs. The soldiers have to do the fighting when the time of trial comes, and they are very careful how they bring on conflicts, knowing that the responsibility and the risk fall on them. But those agents have no responsibility. They and their friends are the vampires who are sucking the life-blood out of the appropriations given for the Indians, and the more strife the better for them, because they are in no danger and have the furnishing of additional supplies whenever they can create a disturbance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what authority he has for his statement, and to what documents he will refer in support of it, that it has been over and over again proved in this House that not 25 per cent. of the large sums annually appropriated for Indians have reached them? I have been here as long as the gentleman from Kentucky, and I have never before heard that statement made, much less heard it proved.

Mr. BECK. A sub-committee composed of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, Mr. SARGENT, of California, and myself in the Forty-first Congress investigated the doings of Mr. Parker, Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have before me our report, in one of the bound volumes of the reports of that Congress. It was shown by conclusive proof in the cases we investigated—the payments made to the Creeks, Quapaws, and other tribes—that out of a payment of $300,000 nearly one-half went to General James G. Blunt and a large portion to traders and others, so that not more than 25 per cent., or, as the proof indicated, really not more than 20 per cent., ever reached the Indians. I remember that when the statement was made that not more than 25 per cent. reached the Indians, Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, rose in his place and said the estimate was too great, and that they never got but 20 per cent.; and we developed many other transactions of like nature.

I can show him by going back to the documents of the last few years that a large amount of these appropriations that pass through the hands of agents and sub-agents are either lost by the way or the Indian agent supplies blankets to the Indians in July, when they do not want them, and will sell them for a song, and that the Indians are cheated to the amount of 25 per cent. of what they ought to receive and I believe Mr. Welsh, who was one of the Indian commissioners, will sustain me in that statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. The answer of the gentleman from Kentucky to my question has developed exactly the style and spirit and manner of the charges which the gentleman makes. He stated broadly, as I understood it, without any qualification, that there were appropriations made to the Indians of over $7,000,000 a year.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. And he stated that it had been again and again proved on this floor that not 25 per cent. of this amount reaches the Indians. When I ask him to specify, he launches out the statement that some five years ago a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations found that of a certain sum of two or three hundred thousand dollars paid to a certain tribe a large percentage of it did not reach the Indians. And that is his specific proof of the very broad charge covering a number of years; and yet the country is constantly hearing from the gentleman these broad, wide-wasting statements covering the whole thing, and these statements are left as a part of the current history of affairs. Now, I ask the gentleman to point out any special evil in this bill and to move to strike out that provision of the bill which authorizes it, and we will vote with him.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman if it is not true that an absolute license was given to the brother of the President as sole trader in a certain district?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am discussing the point before the House, and I ask the gentleman if the only answer he is able to make in support of his general allegation that $7,000,000 was given to the Indians and that only 25 per cent. of that amount ever reached the Indians, is that which he has stated?

Mr. BECK. I am able to say that I believe an investigation into any particular expenditure in this service will prove it, that on the average 75 per cent. of the amount of appropriations made for the Indians is squandered in one way or other; but we are not able to reach all the cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make answer to that that it is not so; and my denial of the charge is as good as the gentleman's assertion.

Mr. BECK. Is not the fact true that one single man, and he the brother of the President, is licensed to trade with certain tribes?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know it. If the gentleman knows it, let him show it.

Mr. BECK. I have that information.

Mr. GARFIELD. Give your information.

Mr. RANDALL. It is in the public press.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ah! the public press!

Mr. RANDALL. It is uncontradicted.

Mr. BECK. The Delegate from Montana has seen the papers, I believe, and knows the facts; let him state them.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair state that debate is exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; on this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. On this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; four times over.

Mr. RANDALL. By what rule?

The CHAIRMAN. Three or four gentlemen have spoken on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That is nothing. The five-minute debate goes on without limit until the committee prevents it; the Chair has no power to stop it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes is allowed to a member to speak in favor of an amendment, and five minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. BECK. But an amendment can be offered to an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BECK. I wished to offer an amendment, but the gavel of the Chairman prevented me from being heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rule to be that on every amendment a member may speak five minutes in favor of it and a member five minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. BECK. The fact I stated in reference to the President's brother is known to the Delegate from Montana.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state what amendment he proposes?

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I stated before that the reason why I wanted to curtail the number of Indian agencies was because they are made nests of corruption and favoritism, and I gave a case. I stated that it was known to the members of the Iowa delegation, and that the records of the Interior Department would show the fact which I stated in regard to one of these agencies. Sir, the Committee on Appropriations have a right to ask for information and I have not, which will show whether I am right or wrong. They can do it, and get at the fact and lay it before the House. I am advised that the statement I have made is true; the Delegate from Montana knows it. The more you increase agencies the more you increase the chances of corruption. I am opposed to the establishment of these new agencies because of the necessary and consequent increase of corruptions.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to ask the gentleman this question: If it be a fact, as he states, that the brother of the President of the United States has the exclusive right to trade with the Indians, is that an unlawful right?

Mr. BECK. It is unlawful under the act, in my opinion.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is lawful, then what is the charge? That it is indelicate to appoint him? Or that it shows corruption? Let us know what it is. The gentleman simply charges that some particular man has the appointment to trade with the Indians. I do not know whether that is true or not; I do not care whether it is true or not.

Mr. BECK. It is unlawful.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is unlawful?

Mr. BECK. It is unlawful to give any man the exclusive right to trade with the Indians to the exclusion of everybody else.

Mr. GARFIELD. Against what law is it?

Mr. BECK. Against the law of 1834, which I read a few moments ago. If there has been any subsequent law upon that subject, I am not aware of it. That law authorizes any man to trade with the Indians who is of good moral character and will give sufficient bond. And neither the President of the United States nor the Secretary of the Interior has a right to grant a monopoly of that trade to one man to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman seen any order or authority in contravention of that law?

Mr. BECK. I have said that I have not access to the Department; I have no means of getting that information; the democratic party have no means of getting it now. But after the 4th of March next we will develop the facts. I have the assurance of the Delegate from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] who stands by the side of the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I asked the gentleman——

Mr. BECK. Will you yield to the gentleman from Montana and let him tell what he knows of the violation of that law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to know if you have any authority.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is entirely irregular.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I am getting quite tired of listening to that speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] When I came here four years ago——

Mr. RANDALL. I call the gentleman to order; the Delegate from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] has the floor.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Montana——

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say——

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I want to answer the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] if I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I am quite tired of listening to this speech of the gentleman from Kentucky. When I came into this Hall four years ago, and the Indian appropriation bill was before the House for consideration, I then heard the speech which has fallen from the lips of the gentleman to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. It has never been answered.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman starts out with the naked, unsupported charge against the Indian agents that they are corrupt, that they are thieves and scoundrels. The gentleman makes the charge to-day as he made it then.

Now, in answer to the gentleman, I make the assertion that, from my connection with this Indian business and from my observation, I believe that there is not a more honest corps of men in the Government service anywhere than the men called and known as Indian agents. There may be dishonest men among them, as there are among all classes of people; but I believe when the Interior Department has discovered a dishonest Indian agent he has been removed as soon as discovered.

I have heard from that side of the Chamber these naked declarations of peculation and fraud and theft and larceny against the Indian Bureau and against the Interior Department. They have been simply naked declarations and nothing else. When gentlemen have been called upon to produce their facts to prove their assertions, it has turned out like the proof the gentleman has produced here to-day of his declaration; it has amounted to nothing; there has been no evidence whatever. Everybody knows that the most difficult branch of the public service is the branch charged with the duty of managing Indian affairs. There are difficulties in that service to encounter which are not to be found in any other branch of the Government service. It has to contend with the border settlers, with the wild Indians, with all the difficulties that can be brought against it. And yet, for the purpose of making political capital, gentlemen get up here on the floor of this House and make charges against the Interior Department and against the Indian service. They make the broad declaration that every year only 25 per cent. of our appropriations for the Indians go to them. And when called upon to present the evidence in support of their declaration, we are told that three or four or five years ago a sub-committee of a committee of this House discovered that of a certain appropriation of $300,000 for some Indians in the Southwest, only 25 per cent went to them. Yet the fact is that it all went to the Indians and they themselves paid it out afterward, perhaps foolishly and wrongfully. It was not the fault of the Government, except perhaps that it ought to have been a little more diligent in guarding the fund for the benefit of the Indians.

I have no objection to the gentleman from Kentucky or any other member of this House attacking anything in this bill; but I do object that a class of people who are away out on the frontier of civilization, exposed with their families to hardships and dangers and privations in order to benefit these Indians, shall be assailed here day after day without any one to raise a voice in their defense and in their behalf. I believe that as a class the Indian agents are as honest, as conscientious, and as capable as any class of people to be found anywhere in the country. General Pope says he believes that the agents in his department are as a rule honest men and are doing well by the Indians. All men who investigate this subject come to the conclusion that these men are doing as well as they can under the circumstances.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, when I entered upon this discussion——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "twelve" and inserting "ten."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Two amendments are pending, as I understand.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I object to the withdrawal.

Mr. RANDALL. When I entered upon this discussion, I entered upon it in no spirit of partisanship——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, have I not the right to object to the withdrawal of the amendment. If I have not, of course I do not insist upon the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that in this case the objection comes too late.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, when I entered upon the discussion of this bill I entered upon it in the best possible spirit known to my nature—certainly in no spirit of partisanship. I was actuated simply by a desire to save the public money—a disposition which, as I stated then, actuates, I believe, the committee who have reported this bill. But I have no question that here is the creation of two new agencies; and I have stated what I believe to be convincing facts and arguments against the incorporation of these agencies in this bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman what he has to say to the letter of his friend, whom he, as I understand, indorses?

Mr. RANDALL. I indorse anything that William Welsh does. Although he is a republican, I indorse his act of the other day in signing a paper remonstrating against the conduct of the President of the United States in using the Army to disperse the Legislature of a State.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Welsh says that that agency is necessary. Do you indorse that?

Mr. RANDALL. I differ from him on this point.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I thought you indorsed him in everything.

Mr. RANDALL. That opinion of Mr. Welsh was given long since; and these facts come to my notice now: that these Indians whom you propose to feed at these two new agencies are now fed at the Red Cloud agency and the Whetstone agency, and that the creation of these two agencies involves an expenditure of $10,000 at each place, although there is, as I can find, but one such item in this bill, and that is for the Black Hills agency. Here is $10,000 in a single case, which my amendment will save; and it is in this spirit alone that I have introduced the amendment.

The President of the United States may think that it is not in derogation of his office for him to appoint his brother to go up there to trade and exclude everybody else from trading. The propriety of thus giving to a relative a monopoly of money-making in that region is a question for him. It is a matter between him and the people who voted for him. According to my judgment, it is no recommendation of any President of the United States that he has given undue facilities to his relatives for making money.

Mr. MERRIAM. Can the gentleman give the evidence that he has done so?

Mr. RANDALL. Sir, you know it is true. There is not a man on this floor who will deny that the brother of the President of the United States has now, under the appointment of Mr. Delano or of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the exclusive right to trade up there.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I deny that, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the first time I have ever heard it denied.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Very well; I deny it.

Mr. KILLINGER. Let the gentleman from Motana [Mr. MAGINNIS] be heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take part in this debate, but can no longer resist the demands from both sides of the House to settle the question of facts which has been raised. As I informed the gentleman from Kentucky at his request a few moments ago, I have to say that a Mr. Charles, of Iowa, held licenses to trade with the Indians at Fort Peck and Fort Belknap, as the successor of Messrs. Durfee & Peck. In the month of October Mr. O. L. Grant was awarded a license to trade in that country and at those posts—a license granted by the agent and ratified by the Interior Department I presume, as is the custom in these cases. Shortly after this the agents at these places served notices upon this Mr. Charles, and told him that his licenses were revoked, and that he must remove from that Territory. This he did not wish to do, having made large investments there, and endeavored by all the means in his power and all the influence he possessed to have the order revoked and to have his licenses renewed. Failing in this, Mr. Charles claims that he offered to close up and abandon the country to the newly-licensed trader if Mr. Grant would buy out his buildings and the goods therein at a reasonable compensation. The parties then, as I am told, endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to fix upon some figures which should be satisfactory to both parties. They failed to agree, and the fight was then transferred to Washington, and Mr. Charles and Mr. Grant were both here during the month of December. The case was placed before the Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. Charles and his agent, Mr. Nunn, who are I believe both influential citizens of Iowa, were strongly backed by some of their Senators and Representatives, and gentlemen of the Iowa delegation can correct me if I am in error; Mr. Charles claiming that his exclusion from that portion of the Indian country was a violation of law, but expressing his willingness to retire in case Mr. O. L. Grant would purchase his buildings and goods at what seemed to him fair prices, but to which the other party demurred. Failing to obtain a renewal of his license or to make a satisfactory sale, Mr. Charles claims that he appealed to the President either to allow him to go on with his trade and sell out his goods to the Indians or that Mr. O. L. Grant should buy him out; the parties to agree upon prices where they could, and to leave all differences between them in this respect to arbitrators appointed in the usual mode. This last offer was, I believe, declined by Mr. O. L. Grant, on the ground that the people of that part of the country were friends of Mr. Charles, and that he could not get a fair arbitration; and, secondly, because he had the sole right to trade at that agency, and consequently a right to buy goods and ship them in or procure them as best he could; and as for Mr. Charles, he might take away his property or leave it. The President did not interfere and the Secretary did not renew Mr. Charles's license, and that gentleman has returned to Montana with the purpose of testing before the United States courts the right of the Interior Department to force him off the reservation, he claiming to be of good character and willing to comply with all the requirements of the non-intercourse law.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Does the gentleman know anything personally in relation to this matter, or does he speak upon hearsay?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I know the facts both from Mr. Grant and from Mr. Charles.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; and the gentleman from Iowa will find out the same thing from Senator ALLISON, if he will apply to him.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I was very loth to be constrained to join in this dicussion——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that all the trading with the Indians in the Indian country was given to this one gentleman to whom he has referred——

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Then what was it you did say?

Mr. RANDALL. I said that the brother of the President of the United States had been given a section of the Indian country, I believe in Minnesota, over which he was to have the exclusive right of trading with the Indians. In that I believe I am not mistaken.

Mr. BECK. You said "up there."

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, I said that the brother of the President had been given a section of country up there, over which he was to have the exclusive right of trading with the Indians; and that the gentleman from Iowa has denied.

Mr. MAGINNIS. His license extended only to Fort Peck, Fort Belknap, and Standing Rock.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Now it appears that only some of the posts up there were given to him.

Mr. RANDALL. And you said it was not so. The RECORD will show the facts. It has turned out that my statement, though denied at the time by the gentleman from Iowa, has been fully sustained.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, I did not wish to be drawn into the discussion of this particular matter, as I have regarded it as a business transaction of which I happened to know all of the facts. But I think it is wrong on the part of this Government, whether the law cited allows it or not, to permit agents to do as they do on these reservations in the Indian country, to allow any Indian agent to give to any one merchant or trader the monopoly of trading with the Indians of particular tribes. By so doing you drive everybody else from the Indian reservations, and when everybody else is driven off there will be nobody left to watch these Indian traders, and as a consequence they will be, as they are now, surrounded only by their willing tools. On every Indian reservation there exists a class of men known throughout the whole Indian country as "affidavit men," because they are willing to make any affidavit the Indian agent may want to cover or conceal frauds upon the Government. It is a wrong practice altogether and ought to be done away with. I believe it is contrary to the intention of the law, but if it is not, then it should at once be made so. When one of these men gets from the trader and the Department the monopoly of trading with the Indians at any one agency or for any one tribe, he can give whatever he may choose to the Indians for a buffalo robe. He may give one cup of sugar or two cups of sugar or anything he pleases for an entire robe. He can swindle the Indians in every possible way. Now, in my judgment, the true intent and meaning of the non-intercourse law is that every man who has a good moral character and who will obey that law is to be allowed to trade with the Indians so the Indians, like everybody else, may buy where they can buy the cheapest and sell to the best advantage—a privilege that none of us would be willing to give up. For fair competition insures liberal and fair dealing.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to state one other fact, that the financial partner of the brother of the President is Mr. Bonnafon, a citizen of Philadelphia whom I know. Now I hope the gentleman from Iowa will look into this matter.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Chairman, representing a State which includes within her borders several Indian agencies, I perhaps would be held inexcusable were I to sit here and listen to the denunciation of Indian agents generally and not put in a defense in behalf of those whom I know not to be open to such charges. Whatever may be the character of others or those who may have been intrusted with agencies in the past I am glad to say that from a personal acquaintance with some and from what I know of others in Nebraska, the agents there I believe are above suspicion. Some have been residents of the State, are well known there, and the gentleman from Kentucky could not with safety or impunity make the broad and sweeping charges of fraud and stealing there as those in which he has indulged here. I have taken occasion to visit some of the agencies, and have a personal acquaintance in some instances with the employés and subalterns, and I have no doubt but the assistants are well chosen and that the affairs of the agency are conducted with honesty and fidelity. Speaking understandingly, sir, I repudiate the charges so unjustly made against gentlemen who are not here in a situation to defend themselves. I would be as quick as any gentleman on the floor to denounce and hunt down corruption in the Indian Department if any exists, but I should be more surprised than any one to find it in the quarter of which I have spoken.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote on my amendment, and to save time I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

And then, on motion of Mr. ELDREDGE, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in accordance with the requirements of the joint resolution approved March 25, 1874, authorizing an inquiry into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera, reports on the subject from the Secretaries of the Treasury and War Departments; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 744) to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia;

An act (S. No. 743) to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia;

An act (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes;

An act (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold; and

An act (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

SOUTHERN OUTRAGES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois, a member of the special Committee on Southern Outrages, that he cannot serve on the committee; and he therefore names as his successor his colleague, Mr. SAMUEL S. MARSHALL.

And then, on motion of Mr. ELDREDGE, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ARCHER: Memorial of the standing committee of the Cincinnati Society of the State of New York, recommending the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1184) to provide for the settlement of revolutionary claims, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BERRY: The petition of Jane Hunter, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BROMBERG: The petition of John McKee, for the purchase for the use of custom-houses and consulates of his publication entitled The Sea-ports of the World, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: Memorial of L. G. Jeffers, of Kansas City, Missouri, relative to the currency, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A paper from Cornelius Cole, in relation to the payment of the Alabama claims, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COTTON: The petition of attorneys of Muscatine, Iowa, for the removal of the United States district court for Iowa from Keokuk to Burlington, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOBBINS: The petition of J. B. Graw, late chaplain Tenth New Jersey Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of citizens of Kentucky, for a post-route from Valley Oak to Crab Orchard, Kentucky, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FOSTER: Two petitions of citizens of Ohio, for the construction of a double-track freight-railway from tide-water to the Missouri River, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HARMER: The petition of William Harper, jr., for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HUBBELL: Petitions of B. F. Emerson and 14 others, of Keweenaw County, Michigan; of N. Wright and 39 others, and Edwin J. Hulburt and 56 others, of Houghton County, Michigan, for the passage of the bill H. R. No. 3830, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of H. J. Stockman and 53 others, of Charlevoix, Michigan, for an appropriation to improve Charlevoix Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petitions of business men of Chicago, Cleveland, and Keweenaw County, Michigan, for an appropriation to improve Eagle Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KILLINGER: Three petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duties repealed in 1872, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LUTTRELL: Resolutions approved and adopted by the subordinate granges of the Patrons of Husbandry of Tulare, Fresno, Merced, and Stanislaus Counties, California, opposing any modification in the line of road that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company are required to construct by the terms of the joint resolution of Congress approved June 28, 1870, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, the petition of A. M. Church and 400 others, of Tulare, California, praying for the protection of settlers and pre-emption claimants on lands granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of Matilda Fairchild, of Tampico, Tennessee, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Emma H. Young, widow of Benjamin F. Young, formerly second lieutenant Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of William S. Stockton, to be placed on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company F, Seventy-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to be paid as such, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PARSONS: The petition of Samuel L. Mather and others, of Cleveland, Ohio, for the passage of the bill H. R. No. 3830, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROSS: The petition of citizens of Tioga and Potter Counties, Pennsylvania, for a post-route from Sunderlinville, Potter County, to Potter Brook, Tioga County, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SMALL: The petition of citizens of New Hampshire, for a post-route from Chatham to North Chatham, New Hampshire, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of George W. Davis, of Baltimore, Maryland, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHEELER: The petition of John Hogan, for the passage of a law giving bounties to certain soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of James A. Hall, that the name of the port called Nobleton be changed to Damariscotta, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of 274 soldiers from Michigan in the late war, for the equalization of bounties and for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the subject, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 14, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislature of Dakota Territory, in favor of an appropriation for the erection of a prison in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Dakota Territory, in favor of the establishment of a post-route from Yankton, via Jamesville, to Childstown, in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Dakota Territory, in favor of the establishment of a post-route from Sioux Falls, Dakota, to Lake Benton, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of Thomas P. Blair, of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, praying compensation for grain purchased by him for the United States and captured by the rebel forces under General Lee in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present a petition of citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty taken off certain foreign products by an act of June, 1872; and also praying for the passage of the currency bill submitted by the Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of the House, providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present the petition of Mary A. Spackman, M. D., and Mary A. Parsons, M. D., setting forth that they are graduates of medicine from the Howard University in this city; that the Medical Association of this District, incorporated by an act of Congress, denies them admission in consequence of a clause in their charter confining membership to "medical and chirurgical gentlemen." They say that by reason of their exclusion they are denied the privilege of consultation, and cannot legally collect their fees, and are refused proper recognition as physicians. They pray for such an amendment to the charter as will give them what they believe to be their rights. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of William A. Wise, praying an amendment of the pension laws, so as to allow arrears of pension in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WASHBURN presented the petition of E. Stillman Dix, late of the Thirty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KELLY presented a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, relating to the protection of salmon in the Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in favor of an appropriation of money for the payment of spoliations committed by the Modoc Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Henry Clegg, late private in Company C, Sixty-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, in relation to the salmon fisheries in the Columbia River. They state that the history of salmon fishing in Europe, along our Atlantic sea-board, and in the Sacramento River of California, shows conclusively that the indiscriminate taking of the salmon soon lessens and finally destroys the catch altogether, and they desire the passage of a law prohibiting the taking of salmon in the Columbia River in traps, nets, seines, or other contrivances with meshes or apertures less than four inches square; to prohibit the taking of salmon by any means in said river between the hours of nine o'clock a. m. Saturday and six o'clock p. m. Sunday, and to forbid the taking of salmon in that river between the 15th day of July and the 1st day of September in each year, and to make such other provisions as may seem to be necessary for the fostering and growth of the fish and the protection of the fish interest. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented additional papers in relation to the application of Lafayette Elder for compensation for a wharf-boat alleged to have been destroyed by rebel forces; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

OFFICERS OBSERVING THE TRANSIT OF VENUS.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus, to report it back and to ask that it be put upon its passage at once. It contains but five lines, and I ask that it may be now considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. It takes no more money; it simply allows the officers of the Coast Survey who were sent upon this service to be paid out of the appropriations for the Coast Survey, as they always have been heretofore in all such cases. But on account of an act which was passed two or three years ago, as now construed by the First Comptroller, it is held that this cannot be done without further authority. The committee did not feel authorized to report a general law covering such cases; but in this particular instance and in order to have further time for consideration as to a general law, they think this relief should be granted. I have in my hand a letter from the chief of the Coast Survey, which in a very few words clearly explains it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise either to support or oppose the bill, but to inquire of the Senator whether it is quite fair toward other Senators and other committees to ask that these bills be put on their passage the very day they are reported If we do it as a general rule, then of course we are unable to investigate matters that are reported. If we do not do it as a general rule, where there is no pressing and special emergency, it seems to be rather unequal and unjust in respect of the Calendar of matters already reported. I submit that to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator will not object. The bill is very short. That is one reason I ask for its consideration. Another reason is that these officers have faithfully discharged their duty, and should be paid. Furthermore, the bill makes no appropriation, and we can pass it in a moment. For these reasons I think no Senator will see any objection to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are fifty bills which we could pass in a moment if we could only get them up. I shall not object in this instance, but will in every other.

Mr. SARGENT. I am obliged to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the regular compensations and allowances to all officers of the Government in the parties engaged in observing the transit of Venus shall be paid from the appropriations for the support of the branches of public service to which the officers are severally attached.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STRONG AND ROSS'S PATENT.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1094) for the relief of Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross, instruct me to report it back, and recommend its passage. It is a bill to which there will be no objection, and I should be very glad to have it put on its passage now, as I may not be here when it comes up on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the bill?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I will state in a moment what the bill is. These persons made inventions for which they have two patents. They made an application to the Commissioner of Patents at the expiration of their first term for an extension. Their attorney here was directed to be present at the Patent Office and file a petition, provided one was not already filed in one of the cases. He went there, and was informed by the clerk that it was already filed, the clerk mistaking another case for this one. He went away. When he came to file his papers in the case he found the clerk had made this mistake, and it was too late then to enter the petition. The bill merely permits the petitioners to enter their petition as though no mistake had been made. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. How long has it been since that mistake was made by the clerk? Is it a recent mistake?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Very recent; last April, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I would like to inquire what the patented article is?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Scales—measures for weighing.

Mr. SARGENT. Not sewing-machines?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. No, sir; not sewing-machines.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants leave to Francis M. Strong, of Vergennes, in the county of Addison, Vermont, and Thomas Ross, of Rutland, in the county of Rutland, Vermont, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent No. 22162, granted to them for an improvement in weighing-scales, of date the 24th day of May, 1859, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years; such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the original term of the patent; and upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents is to consider and determine the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of the patent had not expired. No persons are to be held liable for the infringement of the patent, if extended, for making use of the invention since the expiration of the original term of the patent, and prior to the date of its extension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to report it back with sundry amendments. It seems to me reasonable to believe that the subject before the Senate, as its regular order, may pass from the consideration of the Senate during the present week, and therefore I take this opportunity to give notice that on Monday next I shall ask the consideration of the Senate to this bill; and, considering the business of the country, I shall hope to be seconded by the Senate in the effort to bring it to the attention of the body against all business on that day.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 34) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes," reported adversely thereon, the subject being covered by the House bill previously reported, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee, which is the same railway subject, to report it adversely, inasmuch as it is covered by the bill first reported. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3623) to amend the twenty-third paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 492) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia in favor of the establishment of a district court at Parkersburgh, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 478) relating to certain claims arising from the seizure and conversion by the Treasury Department of certain cotton claimed by individuals, reported adversely thereon and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of J. L. Jones, praying compensation for the use by the Government of his patented compound defensive armor during the late war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, it being a claim against the Government; which was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3499) in relation to the qualification of jurors in the courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2084) to provide for the appointment of clerks for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at New Albany and Evansville, in the district of Indiana, reported adversely thereon and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. PRATT. I hope that bill will be allowed to go on the Calendar.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1082) granting to the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad Company a right of way through the public lands for a narrow-gauge railroad, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3718) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Arthur, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire that that bill go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Merrill Lewis, late of Company K, Seventh Regiment Michigan Cavalry, praying to be granted an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. PRATT. On the 9th of June last House bill No. 1054 was reported back from the Committee on Pensions with a recommendation that the bill should pass with an amendment. I wish to attract the attention of the Senator from New York to the case. It is the bill (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant of Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers. I was observing that on the 9th of June, 1874, the committee considered this bill and directed a report to be made recommending its passage with an amendment cutting off arrears of pension. On the motion of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. FENTON,] on the 7th of this month, this bill was recommitted to the committee for further consideration. I am instructed now by the committee to report the bill back, adhering to the former amendment. There is a report in the case——

Mr. FENTON. I suppose the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. It goes there anyhow. We recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment. There is a report in the case, and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3275) granting a pension to Eli Persons, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3713) granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2949) granting a pension to James R. Borland, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3008) granting a pension to John J. Bottgar, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3274) granting a pension to John S. Corlett, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and recommended the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the bill will go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3716) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of P. A. Krise, of Lynchburgh, Virginia, praying to have the act of February, 1871, giving pensions to the soldiers in the war of 1812, amended, direct me to say that a bill on the subject is before the Senate, and therefore the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1065) for the relief of J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster in the United States Army, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, accompanied by a report in writing. I would ask the Senate to allow this bill to be taken up now. It is a meritorious case indeed. The bill simply enables the accounting officers of the Treasury to determine on further evidence in regard to disbursements, in the absence of vouchers lost in transmission. The committee were unanimous in their report. Suit has been ordered against the late paymaster.

The bill was read, and also the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims to add thereto the following:

Provided, Said accounting officers shall be satisfied that said disbursements were made, and in determining the same secondary evidence may be received.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it the desire to pass that bill this morning?

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senate will allow the bill to be considered this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent, it having been reported this morning.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it is a good example.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would appeal to the honorable Senator from Maine. Suit has been ordered against this paymaster for a balance, and this bill simply enables the accounting officers of the Treasury to determine as to their sufficiency on secondary evidence in the absence of vouchers, which are clearly shown to have been lost in transmission, and unless this bill is passed the suit will go on. It is a very meritorious bill. The Committee on Claims unanimously authorized me to report it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether the accounting officers have expressed any opinion upon this case?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not in writing.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As far as I know, suit has never been commenced against a party under such circumstances if the auditing and accounting officers of the Treasury were satisfied that he was equitably entitled to relief. They have not pressed suit under such circumstances.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know that suit has been commenced, but has been directed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the honorable Senator to withdraw the objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid over. The report will be printed.

NOTICE OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 989) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872; and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

VICTORIA L. BREWSTER.

Mr. ALCORN. On the 11th instant the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON,] from the Committee on Pensions, to whom it had been referred, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 3687) granting a pension to Victoria L. Brewster, and the bill, on his motion, was indefinitely postponed. The circumstances are these: The bill passed the House of Representatives at the last session. The petitioner has been present during the present session, desiring to appear before the committee of the Senate, in order to produce the vouchers and give the reasons why her prayer should be heard by Congress; but on account of her unacquaintance with the forms that were necessary to be observed, she had not an opportunity of appearing before the committee, and the consequence was that the committee reported adversely to her petition and upon the bill of the House, without any proofs whatever. I desire to move a reconsideration of that vote, in order that the bill may be recommitted to the committee, that the petitioner may have an opportunity of appearing and presenting the facts touching her case. I trust there will be no objection, but that the reconsideration may be had, and that the bill may be recommitted to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that it is now too late to move a reconsideration, but it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALCORN. I thought I was in time, this being the third day according to my count. But I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether he desires this case to be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions on the ground that there is any new evidence in the case which was not before the committee?

Mr. ALCORN. Upon the ground that the party did not appear; that the evidence was not submitted to the committee; that the party had not an opportunity to appear; that she was not aware of the time when the committee would pass upon her case. She is a widow, I understand. I know nothing of the merits of the case; but it would be a peculiar hardship if her case were to be passed upon without giving her an opportunity to present her side before the committee. It is a matter of very great concern to her, and I trust the Senator from Indiana will not object.

Mr. PRATT. I observe that wherever the Pension Committee report in favor of a bill granting a pension no motion is ever entered for the reconsideration of the bill; but in a great many cases reported adversely at the present session motions of this character have been made; and the result is to impose of course increased duties upon that committee. We have a great many cases before us. There are only seven members constituting the committee. We work early and late in disposing of the business before us; but if the Senate see fit to recommit every measure that we pass upon adversely, we never shall be able to get through. I do not know anything of the particulars of this case. It was the duty of the petitioner undoubtedly to place on file all the evidence she had in support of her claim. The committee pass upon these cases on the evidence filed before them, and it certainly was not their fault if the petitioner did not make out her case.

Mr. ALCORN. I have a word, sir——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nobody objects; let us do it.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked to the reconsideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The vote is reconsidered, and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

APPROVAL OF A TERRITORIAL ACT.

Mr. BOREMAN. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 909) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, have had the same under consideration and have directed me to report in favor of the passage of the bill and to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a very small matter, and I think there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I object, I wish to know what the bill means. What is the matter with the territorial act now?

Mr. BOREMAN. A mistake was made in a deed conveying a piece of land upon which the penitentiary of the Territory was to be located. A tract of thirty acres was conveyed, and it turned out that by mistake it did not cover the piece of land upon which the penitentiary was to be located. Subsequently this gentleman conveyed ten acres in addition, and that was accepted by the authorities. The territorial act, which was approved by the territorial governor, authorized the reconveyance to him of the ten acres of the original conveyance provided for in the act proposed to be approved. The facts are set forth fully in the act. The committee were satisfied that it was all right and proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is it necessary for us to approve the territorial act? Why is it not valid in and of itself?

Mr. BOREMAN. In an appropriation bill passed in 1868, after this location was made, directing the Secretary of War to expend the money appropriated for the construction of this penitentiary, it was provided that none of the property should be conveyed or transferred without the consent of the United States. This Legislative Assembly provided upon the face of the act that it should take effect upon the approval of Congress. I cannot see any objection to it. The committee have examined it

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 909) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It approves the act entitled "An act for the relief of Jotham A. Draper," passed by the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, approved February 9, 1872.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims have instructed me to move that Thursday, the 21st instant, after the expiration of the morning hour, be fixed for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Claims. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. In view of the notice that has been given by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] I do not think it wise at this time to make such an order, and therefore I object at present. Let it stand as a motion on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I wish the motion entered so that I may call it up to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1127) to empower the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to change the line of their road, and to construct an additional branch; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1128) to restore Frank W. Perry, late captain Twenty-fourth Infantry, to the rolls of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHURZ asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1129) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma and for the better protection of the Indians therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SCHURZ. I would say that I introduce the bill by request; but I have not had time to examine all its details very closely, and therefore I do not assume entire responsibility for it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I recommend to the committee to give it its earliest possible consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1130) for the relief of Walter J. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1131) declaring a post-road in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday morning it will be remembered that I asked the Senate to take up a bill providing for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the laws as to customs duties. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] at that time asked that it be passed over. If he has no objection this morning, I trust the Senate will proceed to the consideration of that bill. It is important that it should pass at as early a day as possible.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to take up the bill referred to.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 964) to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for a commission of seven members, to be composed of one member of the Senate to be designated by the President of the Senate, two members-elect of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress to be designated by the Speaker of the present House, two officers in the customs service, and two citizens familiar with the laws for the collection of the customs duties to be appointed by the President; which commission shall terminate on the first Monday of December, 1875. It is to be the duty of the commission to inquire into such changes of the rates and classification and modes of collecting duties on imported goods as will promote the public service; the relations of foreign trade to domestic industry; the mutual adjustment of the systems of taxation by customs and excise, with a view of insuring the requisite revenue with the least disturbance or inconvenience to the progress of industry and the development of the resources of the country; into the manner in which officers charged with the collection of customs duties perform their duties; and into the best measures to promote the efficiency of this service. The commission is to report through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, either in the form of a bill or bills, a complete revision of the laws relating to customs duties and the collection of the same, and to report such facts pertaining to the trade, industry, commerce, or taxation of the country as will be conducive to the public interests. In order to enable the commission to properly conduct this investigation, each member is hereby empowered to examine the books, papers, and accounts of any officer of the customs revenue, to administer oaths, to examine and summon witnesses, and take testimony; and each and every person falsely swearing or affirming is to be subject to the penalties and disabilities prescribed by law for the punishment of corrupt perjury; and all officers of the Government are required to extend to the commission all reasonable facilities for the collection of information pertaining to the duties prescribed. The members of the commission are to receive only the expenses actually and necessarily incurred while in the discharge of the duties hereby imposed.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out in line 11 the word "December" and insert "January," and in line 12 to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Which commission shall terminate on the first Monday of January, 1876.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert in line 14, after the words "and modes of," the words "imposing and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after the word "revenue," in line 18, the words "with the least disturbance or inconvenience to the progress of industry and the development of the" and insert the words "and promoting the industries and;" so as to read:

The mutual adjustment of the systems of taxation by customs and excise, with a view of insuring the requisite revenue and promoting the industries and resources of the country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 26, after the word "Congress,'" to strike out the word "either."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following words:

Said commission shall have power to appoint a secretary, whose term of office shall expire on the 1st of January, 1876, and whose compensation shall be such as may be fixed and designated by said commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand this bill comes from the Committee on Finance. I presume it has been considered by that committee. I am also informed that it is recommended especially by the Secretary of the Treasury. Am I correct as to these facts?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is so. I have the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury here, and can have it read if it is necessary; but the time is very short. He recommends the passage of the bill which was submitted to him.

Mr. SARGENT. Under those circumstances I do not feel like objecting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state that the bill is not only recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury very strongly, but also by the President of the United States in his annual message, and it has been demanded by various boards of commerce and trade, and by the general industrial interests of the country. I have no doubt that merely in getting rid of the difficulties in the way of the construction of the present customs laws, it will be the best service to the country if the business is properly conducted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be printed in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings, so that it may appear in connection with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1875.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 6th instant, inclosing for my consideration Senate bill 964, entitled "A bill to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties," I respectfully submit the following reasons which would induce me to favor the enactment of the bill:

The Revised Statutes relating to the collection of customs duties, both those which prescribe the rates heretofore generally designated as tariff acts and also those which prescribe the mode of proceeding in the execution of these laws, are at present in a state of some confusion in consequence of the diversity of the original acts from which they are derived. The old acts were passed at periods widely separated in point of time and under circumstances still more unequal, as regards both the necessity for the law or rate of duty imposed and the conditions under which it must necessarily be exacted.

In the condensation and revision of the laws enacted June 22, 1874, the principle of exact reproduction of the language of any statute at that time in force was generally adopted. The paragraphs, therefore, taken from the acts imposing duties in 1861 and 1862, as well as those of 1870 and 1873, were transcribed in the exact words of the original enactment; but being rearranged in the new act, they are undoubtedly in some cases susceptible of new interpretation, thus rendering the identity of the rate as it was in the original act still open to qualification.

For these reasons and many others that may be suggested it would be well to prepare a redraught of the texts of the acts imposing duties on imports.

Still more important is the revision of the laws relating to the collection of customs duties. On this subject the existing statutes are still more diverse, as regards the time and circumstances under which they were originally enacted, than perhaps are the laws relating to any other subject whatever. Large portions of the original act of 1799 still remain unrepealed, with portions of the acts of 1800, 1801, 1823, and other remote dates.

The recent acts of 1866 to 1874, relating to the penalties and violations of the law, are also particularly diffuse, and in some respects contradictory as they stand on the statute-books.

Correction of these possible contradictions, or at least proper determination as to the precise course to be pursued in their execution, is now particularly important.

I have therefore to express my general approval of the bill as drawn, and would recommend its passage with such modifications as the wisdom of Congress shall suggest.

In addition to the considerations applying to the general subject of the bill, it should also be stated that the distribution of the various branches of the customs organization, including the distinction of collection districts, the designation of ports, the appointment and duties of officers, are all subject to the same remark as to the blending of statutes dating from the beginning of the Government to the present time.

Much modification of what is necessarily recognized and obeyed as law is really necessary to adapt these parts of the system to present necessity. The general relation of the customs to other revenue laws requires also to be considered, simply from the point of revenue alone.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE G. WRIGHT,
United States Senate.

DEWITT C. CHIPMAN.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3177) for the relief of DeWitt C. Chipman.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to DeWitt C. Chipman of $8,006.17, in full satisfaction and payment of all demands whatever of Chipman as late collecter of internal revenue for the eleventh district of Indiana.

The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the bill by striking out in line 6 "$8,006.17" and inserting "$5,535.23."

Mr. SCOTT. From what committee is that bill reported?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Committee on Finance. The committee instructed me to report it with the amendment just read.

Mr. SCOTT. Is there a report?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is a House bill, and there is a report. If the Senator desires it, the report can be read; but it is quite lengthy.

Mr. MORTON. I think the bill is a very just one, and ought to pass. It has been delayed for a long time.

Mr. FERRY of Michigan. The bill was thoroughly considered in the committee. I will state the case to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think on refreshing his recollection he will remember it. I had it in charge. The report is quite full, and its reading would occupy more time than is left of the morning hour. The House passed it, giving him over $8,000, which included personal compensation. The Senate committee, in its judgment, decided that personal compensation should not be given, thus reducing the amount to $5,535.23. I think there can be no objection to the bill. It is a very meritorious case, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not desire to interpose an objection, but it is because I have some faint recollection of the bill and did not assent to it that I made the inquiry. Perhaps if the report were read it would refresh my recollection.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have no objection to having the report read.

Mr. SCOTT. My impression is that the bill is one which elicited considerable discussion in the committee and did not secure a unanimous report. If the Senator thinks it proper to pass it without hearing that report, I cannot concur in that. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. For the purpose of saving time, I will make a statement, and perhaps that will satisfy the Senator. Mr. Chipman was collector of the eleventh district of Indiana for over four years. When his successor was appointed, he was required to turn over to him the tax-list, whether collected or not. His successor proved to be an inefficient officer, and to protect himself, inasmuch as he was charged with the whole account passed over to his successor, this man Chipman collected it as far as he could and reported to the Department, and to a certain extent the amount was credited to him and abated in the charge against him, but to some extent it was not done. Mr. Chipman claimed an abatement, inasmuch as he protested against the sum being charged against him. It would seem hard that an officer holding a place in the service of the Government and chargeable with the whole list of taxes when they were not collected should be held responsible for the duties of a successor who may have been efficient or not.

In this case Mr. Chipman, understanding the character of his successor, in order to protect himself stepped in and collected the taxes to the fullest extent that he could. He did ask compensation during that time, but the committee of the Senate decided that he was not entitled to it, inasmuch as he was not really an officer of the Government, but to the extent of the actual expenses paid out he should be reimbursed. The committee have cut down the House bill to that extent, excluding all salary, but paying him for the actual expenses paid. I would here state incidentally that the Department did abate $1,900, not the full amount claimed, thus setting the precedent that so far as just abatements were concerned it was the practice of the Department to allow them. Mr. Chipman claims that the whole amount should be deducted. It seemed fair in the judgment of the committee that the amount should be allowed him. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. SCOTT. Upon the statement of the Senator from Michigan, I do not know that I shall make any further objection; but my recollection of the bill was that in effect it increased the salary of the collector. If the Senator now states that the bill was so far reduced as to take out of the amount now proposed to be allowed all that looked like an increase of his salary, I have no objection to make. But my objection was that he had the right to make his application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and have his salary adjusted; that that application had been made, and he had got all that that officer thought proper to allow him, and that this was simply an application to Congress to override the action of the Commissioner and increase his salary. That was my impression about the bill. If I am wrong in that, I shall not insist on the objection.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In reply to the Senator I will call the Senate's attention to the last page of the report where the case is summarized.

Your committee are of opinion that the increased salary claimed should not be allowed, but that the following items should be allowed, to wit:

Conditional report	$1,404 68
Duplicate collections	684 79
Uncollected taxes	2,248 76
Actual expenses paid, exclusive of salary after retirement	1,197 00
	5,535 23

making a total of $5,535.23, the payment of which the committee recommend.

I will state to the Senator that there is no salary included in this amendment which the committee have reported. That was excluded by the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to the vote being taken upon this bill, but I desire to say that the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as I remember, and all the papers show the case to be precisely this: that here is an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to Congress. Everything this person is entitled to by law by possibility, that officer has power to grant. He refused to grant him the relief he asked, and he appeals to Congress. I do not wish to interpose any objection to this bill, but I mention it now. Opposing the bill as I did in the committee and as I do now, I want to call the attention of the Senate so that it shall not be a precedent to bind me hereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4321) removing the political disabilities of John Withers, Joseph F. Winter, and William Kearney; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 743) to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 744) to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 1068) to remove the limitation restricting the circulation of banking associations issuing notes payable in gold;

A bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3819) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF A REFERENCE.

Mr. HARVEY. I observe that a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of funds required for the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for the year ending June 30, 1876, was on the 8th instant referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed. It has been printed, and I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the more appropriate reference would be to the Committee on Appropriations, it being an estimate from the head of a Department. I therefore make the motion that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the communication, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, yesterday when the motion was made that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with my consent, I had very nearly concluded the remarks which I deemed it proper to submit to the Senate on this question. I hope on coming to this question again to-day that I shall not detain the Senate at any very great length. I had gone over the question, so far as the facts surrounding the government of Louisiana at the time of the issuance of his order to the military were concerned, and the action on the part of the military in view of the law under which the Legislature was to be organized, and had referred to all that which I deemed it proper to comment upon in that connection. At the time that I suspended my remarks, however, I had just had read at the desk of the Secretary a communication made to me by a man, a Georgian by birth, a resident of that State at this time, a candidate for Congress on the republican ticket at the last election. Of this man I know nothing save that which I have heard in reference to him here. I am told that he was a colonel commanding a regiment in the confederate army against the Government of the United States; that on that side he proved himself a gallant soldier. This would not in my estimation add anything to his character as a man of honor or a man of veracity; but to my friends on the opposite side it ought not, at least, to be in derogation of his character. Whether the statements made by him be true or false it is not for me to say, but for others to say who have knowledge of the facts. I had the communication read for the reason that we have been told in this Chamber that all was peace and quiet in the State of Georgia. This man asserts to the people of the country that when he was nominated by the republican party he was serenaded that night by the soft and delightful music of tin pans, tin horns, and everything that was calculated to be wholesome and pleasant to him in his dreams. We are told by him that at different precincts in his district negroes were refused the right to vote because they were too old, and it was said they were too old under the law to vote. We are told by him that in divers and sundry instances men with their tax-receipts in their hands were refused the right to vote at the polls. We are told by him that when the colored people were drawn up in line in front of the polls in order that they might under the law deposit their ballots, pepper was thrown in their eyes, smoke in their faces, tobacco quids were thrown in their faces—every character of annoyance to these poor people was made use of to drive them away from the polls. Yet we are told here that the only friends they have in this country are to be found in the ranks of the democratic party in the South!

Men may talk as they please about peace; they may talk as they choose about rights guaranteed in the Constitution; they may say what they please about the laws being faithfully and honestly administered in those States; but while men are deterred either by improper influences or brute force in this manner, it is not a community of law-abiding citizens where equal rights are protected and observed. While I am on that point in reference to the State of Georgia, I deem it proper for me to call the attention of the Senate to a fact that has been brought to my notice, and a very singular one too. In courts of justice, under the rules of evidence by which men are tried and by which courts are governed and guided in the administration of justice between man and man, circumstances are taken as testimony, when linked together, to prove the rights of parties or to prove the violation of law. I find published in one of the newspapers of the State of Georgia the votes cast at the last election by congressional districts. One of the Senators has taken the pains to compile the number of inhabitants in some of those districts, colored and white, and then to compare the votes, and let the circumstances speak for themselves. Let the facts tell their own tale as to whether men are deprived of their rights in that State or not.

* No such county named in Census Report.

I will take the fourth district of Georgia, copied from this paper publishing the returns of the different counties in the various districts. The fourth congressional district of the State of Georgia is composed of Campbell, Carroll, Chattahoochee, Coweta, Douglas, Harris, Heard, Marion, Meriwether, Muscogee, Talbot, and Troup Counties. In these counties the white population is 67,746; the colored population is 64,276—a difference of a little over 3,000 between the white and colored population. Estimating the voting population as one to seven, that would leave a difference of a few hundred on the side of the white population. We take it for granted at least that out of 64,276 colored people in a congressional district there were certainly some few who would have voted the republican ticket. Now, what was the vote in that congressional district last fall? The democratic vote was 9,218. That is the majority of the white voting population of the district. What was the republican vote? Seventeen in all—all told—out of a population of 64,276 colored and some white voters of the republican party. In one county 14 republican votes, in one 1, in another 1. In eight counties, where there were thousands of colored people, not a solitary vote was cast for the republican party. I desire to know—I ask the question in all candor—can any man stand upon this floor and tell me that there were but seventeen men out of a colored population of 64,000 that were able to vote the republican ticket? If but 17 republican votes were cast, what is the natural inference to be drawn from the facts and circumstances that surrounded those people at that time? There can be but one explanation of it, and that is the secret, silent torture of a threat against these people on account of a desire to preserve their rights and property. They were afraid to exercise the right given to them by the Constitution and the laws of their own country. There is no other inference that can be drawn, there is none other that is fair or just in the premises; and yet we are told day by day on this floor that all is peace and harmony, that no man is molested there, that everything goes on in accordance with justice, in accordance with right, and in accordance with the laws of our country.

I have the votes of some other districts in the State of Georgia as compared with this one that I have just read. The eighth district in Georgia, out of a population almost equal to the one I have given, cast twelve votes for the republican ticket, several thousand for the opposite. Where, let me ask, were all the colored republicans of the eighth district of Georgia on the day of the election? Men may denounce the statement that I made here yesterday, but it proves its own truth by an examination of these returns. When we were told yesterday by a candidate that some of his voters were not permitted to vote, that some were denied on account of their age, that others were denied on account of their locality, that pepper was thrown in their eyes and smoke in their faces and they driven from post to pillar, the polls not opened till a late hour, when none but white people were permitted to vote, do we not know that all these things took place for the purpose of deterring those men from the exercise of that boon which belongs to the American citizen, and that is the right to vote at an election? Sir, I ask you what is citizenship in this country if not the right of selecting by your ballot the men who shall exercise the functions of office under the laws in this land. If that right is denied, I ask you where is the great boast of American citizenship in this country? Once it was said that the proudest thing that could be uttered by a citizen of Rome was that he thanked his God that he was a Roman citizen. Why did he do this? Because in those days the rights that Rome gave her citizens were protected. For that reason the boast went forth of citizenship; but in this country where we boast of American citizenship, I ask you what becomes of the boast if the greatest right that inheres to the citizen under the laws and Constitution of our country is denied? What is there then for the citizen to boast of?

We are told, however, that in the State of Georgia there are no outbursts showing vindictiveness of feeling, that there is nothing there from which you can draw the inference that there is any but the kindest feeling toward the people of the United States, both North and South, and toward the officials of the United States Government. I do not know why such statements should be made. I cannot imagine why men should assert such propositions on this floor when every day their own newspapers contradict such statements. In order for us to ascertain the facts as to whether the sentiment in that country is as described, I send to the Clerk's desk a newspaper published in Atlanta, the capital of the State of Georgia, where it is presumable at least that the papers are fair representatives of the sentiments of the State, and ask the Secretary to read first the marked editorial on the left, and then to read further as I shall suggest.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE RADICAL PLOT DEVELOPING.—The telegram sent by P. H. Sheridan to the Secretary of War bears all the evidence of being part of a plot hatched by the radical leaders at Washington to provoke an armed uprising in the South. Sheridan deliberately proposes to punish the leaders of the White Leagues by a military commission. Further on Sheridan declares that "it is possible that if the President would issue his proclamation declarjng them banditti, no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me."

We now look for a proclamation from Grant doing as Sheridan suggests. The situation increases in gravity. Grant is evidently playing a desperate game. He has sent somebody to Louisiana "who will hurt." Now, let Grant declare Ogden, Marr, and the rest banditti, and then we will see who is hurt. If any hanging or shooting is to be done, it is just possible that a braggart and dirty tool of an upstart like Sheridan may ornament a lamp-post quite as rapidly as any White Leaguer "ringleader" may grace a gallows.

Mr. LOGAN. Now let the Secretary read in the next column marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE LOUISIANA INFAMY.—Like the liar that he is, when General Sheridan arrived in New Orleans he informed several gentlemen who called upon him that there was no truth in the report which stated that he was to take command in Louisiana. He was merely, he said, on his way to Havana with a party of ladies. Our dispatches this morning tell what he is doing in New Orleans. Beaten in their conspiracy to defeat the public will, the radicals appealed to the Federal military authorities. There had not been any disturbance of any character. The Legislature had met and organized by the election of Ex-Mayor Wiltz, of New Orleans, as temporary chairman. Swearing in the members began; the radicals withdrew; and shortly after a body of soldiers entered the chamber, reinstated the radical clerk, and virtually broke up the assembly.

Here Sheridan steps in with another infamous lie on his lips. He telegraphs the Secretary of War that "he regrets to announce a spirit of defiance of all lawful authority, and an insecurity of life." At this writing we have heard nothing further, but we presume that New Orleans is now virtually under martial law, and that the work of infamy has been completed.

And yet we hope to hear a different report. There are twenty-five thousand able-bodied white men in New Orleans. In the same city there are twenty-five hundred Federal soldiers. Admitting that every Federal soldier would consent to fire on the people, they are no match for the citizens. We write it deliberately, that we hope the dispatches will bring us news before we go to press that the streets of New Orleans are barricaded, and that twenty-five thousand freemen are crushing to atoms Sheridan and his horde. There is not a single feeling of animosity in our hearts against the United States as we write. All that we see is the act of infamy, by means of which the people of Louisiana are to be delivered over to scoundrels and despots.

Again and again do we reiterate the hope that the citizens of New Orleans will take up the gage of battle so insolently thrown down to them. Since blood must flow in defense of their liberties, then let the streets of the Crescent City again be the scene of the conflict of patriots against a most infamous usurpation. We pray it—pray it, as if to God—that there has been no hesitating, no shrinking. Who is Grant, that he should seek to act the part of master of the South? Who is Sheridan, that he should attempt to crush the white people of Louisiana? Is it not time that this tyranny be brought to a sudden and, if it must be so, a bloody end? Can the people of the North blame Louisiana, if in this moment she rises grandly in arms, and hurls off the fetters with which she is about to be bound?

Let the issue be met in Louisiana, and the question of the rights of the Southern States be finally settled. We are heartily tired of the game that is being played in the South. If there ever will be a time for the people of New Orleans to begin fighting in earnest, that time is now. If ever resistance to Federal usurpation was justifiable, it is now. If the time is ever to come for twenty-five thousand white men to demonstrate their strength, that time is now come.

We therefore await the arrival of telegrams informing us that the blow has been struck in earnest.

If President Grant is anxious to provoke a civil war, as he is said to be, it is, perhaps, best to accommodate him at once. We never will have a better reason for an uprising than exists in New Orleans at present. Nothing that Grant may do can more thoroughly unite the freemen of the entire United States than what his tool, Sheridan, has just done in New Orleans. The time for argument, for appeals, for remonstrance, is past. Barricades ought to be the fashion now, with armed men behind them.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to make just one remark? I will not detain him more than a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir.

Mr. GORDON. I only want to say that I have no doubt the editor of that paper was sincere in all he said; I have no doubt he reflected the sentiments of his own heart; but I know full well that he did not reflect the opinions of the people of Georgia; he did not reflect the sentiments of the democratic party of Georgia. He does not pretend to belong to the organization of the democratic party of Georgia. He does not run any paper which claims allegiance to the democratic party of Georgia. He claims to run an independent paper, and he does run an independent paper. He neither supported the democratic nominee in the district in which he lives, nor did he support the democratic nominees in other districts. On the contrary, he supported the opposition in the district just above the district in which he and I both live.

Now, sir, I wish to have read, if the Senator will allow me, a telegram from the governor of my State, who is a democrat and a member of the party. This gentleman who is the editor of that paper I have no doubt is a democrat. He votes, when he does vote, for the democratic party; but his paper disclaims belonging to any organization, and he runs on an independent schedule, responsible for his own utterances, and nobody responsible for them but himself.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that I do not give way to have that telegram read as part of my argument by any means. I will proceed. He will have ample opportunity to read the telegram hereafter.

He says that this man no doubt is a democrat. I do not say that the whole people of Georgia entertain the same sentiments. I have not said so at any time; but I read these articles in this paper to show that some portion of the people of that State do entertain these sentiments. I have read all that I have read to show the circumstances and to show the character of feeling that there is all over that country. Now, I would ask any Senator on this floor, do not the democratic papers all over the South announce nearly the same proposition? Did not the democratic papers all over the South indorse Penn's revolution against Governor Kellogg? Do not the democratic papers of the South to-day defy the powers of this country in reference to the action in Louisiana? If they do not, I have failed to see one that has taken a different course. This one, the Senator says, is an independent paper; but no doubt, he says, the editor is a democrat. It is immaterial to me whether he be a democrat or an independent, or what he may. He is speaking the sentiment of his locality; or, at least, he pretends to represent the sentiment of his locality. First, he thinks it would be well to hang Sheridan to a lamp-post. I have no doubt that a majority of the democrats in the South in 1863 believed just the same thing, that it would have been well to hang Sheridan; and I have no doubt they believe it now.

But in the conclusion of the second article what does this paper say? I care not whether it is the sentiment of Georgia or not; what I am speaking to is the impression that is being made upon the people of the State of Louisiana. What effect do such articles have upon the twenty-five thousand people in Louisiana who are organized as a White League, when they are told by the public press of the South that it is their duty to barricade the streets of New Orleans; that it is their duty to make war upon the troops of the United States Government, for the purpose of overturning that State government; that it is their duty to let blood flow in the streets of New Orleans, and that, if ever the time has come for that to be done, the time is now? I use it for the purpose of showing that not only the speeches of the opposition but the newspapers tend to work excitement in the minds of those people, to plunge them into bloody revolution, so that then they may be supported by those who stand by them, and, in that way, the country involved in war again. That is the reason why I appealed to these suggestions, to show the effect that is being had and the purposes that these men have in view to stimulate that population which they know is a population almost like a powder-magazine.

If the people of the South and the democrats of the North will but remember for a moment the character of the people of Louisiana, without speaking of them as disreputable people they must know that the white portion of Louisiana, the natives of that State, are an excitable people. We know they are an irritable people. We know that the creole population is a revolutionary people. Wherever they may be found, in Louisiana or elsewhere, they are a revolutionary people. It is well known if any one will examine the history of that kind of population that this is the fact. They being that class of people are as ready to revolutionize against one government as they are against another, unless it is a government that they control. They are of that class of people who themselves must control, whether in the minority or majority, or else they are in favor of revolution against the existing "powers that be." Upon a class of people so inflammable as these people in Louisiana are, I ask what the effect of these editorials and speeches in the same line must be? Naught but to inflame, naught but to excite, and naught but to incite them to bloody deeds of revolution against the country, which revolution might become wide-spread and this country all be involved in ruin. It is against these things that I appeal to the country; it is against these things that I am now speaking to the people.

But, sir, passing from the State of Georgia, and I am sure I have said as little about that State and the people of North Carolina as I could under the circumstances and facts, I desire now to call the attention of the American Senate to another State, and that is the State of Alabama. I presume the State of Alabama has been included in the remarks of Senators here when they have been speaking of the peaceful and orderly manner of the people of the South. The other day there was read from a newspaper on the other side of the Chamber evidence of this character in reference to the State of Alabama, that in one county some eleven colored people had been indicted for murder, the murder of colored men. That was cited to show that the murders perpetrated in that State were murders perpetrated by colored men on colored men. I took a different view of that testimony which was read in the Senate Chamber, although I remained silent. It proved to me this and nothing more, that when a colored man committed an offense he was indicted and punished for it; but when a white man committed an offense he went scot-free. That was the conclusion I formed in reference to this evidence. When a colored man violates the law he must be punished. "Why not," say men of these notions, "why not punish the colored man for murder?" He ought to be; but when I ask you why not punish the white man for murder as well? the difference is this: In the North we respect the lives of all men, colored or white, and if a man commits murder we do not ask the complexion of his victim, but we ask the question of his justification or excuse.

The Senator from Maryland said in his speech, "There are disturbances in the South, but there have been murders in the North, outrages in the North." I admit it. I admit there are murders committed in the North and robberies committed in every northern city; but when I admit that, I add that we punish our murderers in the North; we send them to the penitentiary or hang them. Several men have been hanged in the last few months in the Northern States for murder. White men and women are in the State prison for murder to-day. In the Northern States we call murder, murder. In the Northern States, when a man commits murder, we call him a murderer, and we punish him for that offense. The difference is that we hang our murderers or we send them to the penitentiary and call them murderers, and in the South you do not even indict them, but speak of them as men rising up in defense of their liberties.

Before the abolition of slavery who ever heard of a white man being punished for shooting a negro? Nobody. If he shot a negro down he would be liable to an action of trespass for the amount the negro was worth, the same as if the man had shot a horse. He paid the owner of the negro his value, and that ended it. The habit grew so strong that men down there think they have the same right now to murder negroes that they thought they had then. The only difference is that they had to pay for them then, and now they do not.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. In my State six months ago two white men were condemned to death for killing a negro, and a republican governor commuted the sentence to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary. There is one case in my own town. There are other cases in my State.

Mr. LOGAN. That is one case. I am very glad to hear of that. It is the first one ever I did hear of. [Laughter.] I will give you cases enough before I am done where they have not been punished or attempted to be punished.

But, sir, I was speaking of including Alabama in this category of States where the people are so subservient to the rules and the decorum of society and the laws of the land. Is Alabama a peaceable State—Alabama with a democratic governor? O, says my friend from Maryland, give the democrats control, and you will have peace. You have a democratic governor in Alabama; Alabama is a democratic State. Now, let us see how quiet it is down there.

For the purpose of satisfying my friends on the other side of the Chamber as to the condition of things in Alabama, as to the security of life and property, I will have read a letter published in an Alabama paper from Judge Keils. Judge Keils is a man of respectability, judge of a court in Alabama. I have met him frequently myself. I recognize him as a gentleman. He is an old man, and here is his letter containing just what he told me out of his own mouth the other night at my house. I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EUFALA, ALABAMA, November 6, 1874.

EDITOR JOURNAL:

I telegraphed you last night that my son Willie was dead. This you must know is almost overwhelming me; I am in poor condition to write. Just at dark, before the counting of votes had commenced at Spring Hill, the crowd rushed into the room and commenced firing at me. When they entered I stepped to the end of the counter, (the election was held in an old store,) pulling Willie behind me to prevent him being shot. Several shots were fired at me, when the lamp was smashed. All was dark then, and Willie and myself stepped behind the counter and sat down under it. A vigorous firing then commenced at the end of the counter, which I thought at the instant were entering the counter and doing no damage. It was at this time Willie was shot, one ball entering the bowels and the other three entering the right thigh. Willie did not flinch or complain, though his hand was on my shoulder while he was being murdered, so that I knew nothing of it till after those (or the one) who murdered him had moved off. If I had known he was being shot I could easily have killed the fellow; but as soon as he moved off Willie said to me, "Pa, let us try to get out; I am shot to pieces." This was the first intimation I had that he was shot. Then I told him to be quiet a little longer. But just then several gentlemen rushed to me and assured me they would protect me, and they did. Then I missed Willie's hand from my shoulder, felt for him in the dark, but could not find him. As he (Willie) told me afterward, some demon seized him by the leg dragged him on the floor, and kicked him. There was such firing and yells that I heard nothing of this brutal dragging and kicking at that time. The mob was yelling "Kill him," "Shoot him," "D—n him," "Kill him," &c. One or two of those who saved me (they were of the better class of democrats) went to see after Willie, found him, and carried him away with the assistance of some colored men. I found him at Dr. Davie's, near by, to which place I was guarded a few minutes after. He, myself, and wife and daughter, who went to Spring Hill at once, as soon as they could get there, were all treated well at Dr. D.'s and by the neighbors.

This was a put-up job to destroy the ballot-box, in which there was four hundred and fifty or five hundred republican majority, and murder me. And their treatment in dragging and kicking Willie and telling him as they did, "God d—n you, get out of here," shows that they were quite as willing to kill him as me, because they knew it was not me they were kicking and dragging, although it was dark in the room.

Willie was in his seventeenth year, and a better, high-toned, more honorable boy never lived, I am sure. He did no one any harm. He said to me often during the canvass that he knew I was in danger, and wanted to go with me to republican meetings, and he went with me to most of them. Then he wanted to go with me to Spring Hill to the election, as he did. When some firing was done out in the crowd, and he thought I was in danger inside the room, he said he wanted to come in. The managers consented, and this is why he was in there.

I feel that I can never get over his death.

Yours truly,

E. M. KEILS.

Mr. LOGAN. This man Judge Keils stated to me—and doubtless he stated the truth—that he left his own voting place because his life was not secure at that poll and went to Spring Hill, for the reason that there was a large majority of republican voters there, so that he might be secure. At his own place his life had been threatened, a riot had taken place, and several colored men had been killed that day. But at Spring Hill there were four hundred and fifty majority of republican voters, principally colored men. After the voting was all over Judge Keils undertook to aid or assist, not by force, but in protection of the ballot-box, to watch it, to see that it should not be seized and stuffed. These men came upon him where he was, fired at him, and murdered his son. For what offense? For no offense in the world except that he was a republican and desired that the votes of this four hundred and fifty majority of colored men should be counted the same as the votes of anybody else. Yet we are told all is peace! Sir, when you talk about murders in the North, let me say we have no such murders as these. Men there exercise their rights of the elective franchise without being murdered. There may be frauds, but men are not murdered for political opinions. But in Alabama, a democratic State, the judge of a court on an election day, desiring the votes to be counted honestly, is fired on and his son murdered by a mob. Accidentally they did not murder him, but murdered his son, only seventeen years old, who was holding on to his father's shoulders in the dark at the time he was riddled with bullets. And we are told these are law-abiding, patriotic people! For this offense nobody was even arrested.

I could give a number of other cases in that State. I do not desire to go through all the statements I have in reference to these different States. It would take me the rest of this day. Having occupied nearly all of yesterday, I have not the time nor have I the physical endurance to stand it. I only instance a few cases in the different States as I pass along to show the feelings of the people there, and that they are not exactly as they have been stated to us. Here is from Alabama a statement of an occurrence of a most recent character. I will read it:

Robert Reed, a member of the General Assembly of Alabama from Sumter was called to Mobile last week as a witness before the grand jury of the United States court.

This was a member of the Legislature of that State.

After he was discharged, he went into the city to make some purchases, when he was set upon by three or four white-leaguers of Mobile, who followed him into a store, where the leader asked his name and struck him over the head with a stick, and immediately pistols were drawn, but Reed succeeded in making his escape for protection to the United States court-room? It is understood that those assaulting Reed were of the class of citizens of Mobile who furnished the Sumter County prisoners with refreshments while in jail, and their antipathy may have been occasioned by the belief that he was in some way connected with that finding of a true bill against those parties. This assault was made in the broad daylight, and the parties are well known in that city; but at last accounts no arrests had been made. Perhaps the only regret felt is that Reed was not killed, as it is evident that that was their purpose. Yet it is pretended that Mobile is a law-abiding city!

There a member of the Legislature of what you call a sovereign State goes to the United States court on a summons to appear as a witness before the grand jury to testify, and the very moment he leaves the court-room, having testified, he is assailed by your White League ruffians and his life attempted to be taken; and you call these law-abiding citizens! A man cannot even testify against your murderers and your outlaws in your States. Every day the question is put to us "You have the courts, why do you not punish these men?" Here is the reason why they are not punished: If a witness goes, no matter who, to testify against these outrages before a grand jury, his life is not safe for a solitary moment; and yet we are told "You have the courts, and why do you not execute the law." Why, sir, is it not cool for any man on this floor to talk about the execution of law and put it to us "you have the courts and why do you not do it," when neither court nor jury nor witness is safe for a moment in his life and his rights under the laws of this land? I suppose I might be asked the question why could not a man be punished for treason in one of these Southern States during the southern rebellion. It is obvious to everybody. Is there any man so great a fool as not to know that he could not have convicted one of them before a jury or a court either; that the attempt would have been followed by assassination; that you could not convict a man where they were all in sympathy with one another? Do my friends on the other side of the Chamber, when they taunt us with the fact that we have the courts, expect that we can exercise the jurisdiction of the courts or bring men to trial when every man almost of their side is in sympathy with the men who perpetrate the wrongs against the law and by whom the wrong-doer must be tried? Yet we are asked "Why do you not try them?" It would be like trying a Morman for having seventeen wives before a jury each member of which had five wives! [Laughter.]

I now wish to quote from the President's message in reference to the outrage complained of as having been perpetrated against the Legislature of Louisiana, which I had not on yesterday an opportunity of doing. The President says:

Respecting the alleged interference by the military with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th instant, I have no knowledge or information which has not been received by me since that time and published. My first information was from the papers of the morning of the 5th of January. I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence. I am well aware that any military interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of the State Legislature or any of its proceedings, or with any civil department of the government, is repugnant to our ideas of government. I can conceive of no case, not involving rebellion or insurrection, where such interference by authority of the General Government ought to be permitted or can be justified. But there are circumstances connected with the late legislative imbroglio in Louisiana which seem to exempt the military from any intentional wrong in that matter. Knowing that they had been placed in Louisiana to prevent domestic violence and aid in the enforcement of the State laws, the officers and troops of the United States may well have supposed that it was their duty to act when called upon by the governor for that purpose.

Again, I desire to read another paragraph from the President's message for the same purpose that the other was read:

Nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature. That the democratic minority of the house undertook to seize its organization by fraud and violence; that in this attempt they trampled under foot law; that they undertook to make persons not returned as elected members, so as to create a majority; that they acted under a preconcerted plan, and under false pretenses introduced into the hall a body of men to support their pretensions by force, if necessary, and that conflict, disorder, and riotous proceedings followed, are facts that seem to be well established; and I am credibly informed that these violent proceedings were a part of a premeditated plan to have the house organized in this way, recognize what has been called the McEnery senate, then to depose Governor Kellogg, and so revolutionize the State government.

I have read these paragraphs only to be placed in my remarks. I now desire to call the attention of the Senate in the same connection to certain dispatches that appear with the President's message, which are now official documents before the country. Among these dispatches is the following from the governor, William P. Kellogg, to the Attorney-General of the United States at Washington, September 1, 1874:

Telegraphed you last night regarding Coushatta affair to Long Branch, care of President. If you have not left Washington, please direct operator at Long Branch to repeat. Further information makes the affair worse even than first reported. The six white men killed were all of good character—planters and business men—but four of them were northern republicans.

I read this dispatch in support of what I stated yesterday, that these men at Coushatta were industrious, energetic citizens, attending to their own business at the time they were taken out and murdered.

In further justification of what has been said, of what has been done, and of what may hereafter be done, and in support of what we have said on this floor in reference to the outrages of the South, I ask the reading of an official document here that I presume no one will dispute. We have been told, and right here I want to put it back to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] and to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] for if he will allow me to quote from the evidence of an old Delawarean once here in the Senate Chamber, "the whole eyes of Delaware are upon him." He said "this outrage business had performed its office." So did the Senator from Maryland. He laughed at the idea of these outrages being talked about or used any more; the thing had played its part—had become stale. Sir, do murders become stale; does violation of law become stale; does treason against the Government become stale; does rebellion against a State become stale; do robbery, piracy, and blood-letting become stale in this country? Is it the fact to-day that this thing has become so stale that murder can go on day after day, and scores of men be slaughtered as the pigs in a pen that are fattened for that purpose, and we to be told these stories have become stale, these stories are played out? The man who can intimate that murders shall not be spoken of because they are so frequent, and that because of their frequency they become stale, that man but encourages murder. Murders stale! Yes, they have been perpetrated in such a horrible, audacious, outrageous, and damnable manner by your Ku-Klux and White Leagues of the South that the stench of outrage and murder and perjury goes to heaven and cries for revenge for the lives of these innocent victims. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord," and not you. The Judge of all good and evil, the Judge of the world, the great Judge that decides by the scales of justice and weighs the right and wrong, will yet judge of these offenses and of the men who encourage them, of the men who perpetrate them, of the men who cover up their bloody and damnable crimes, and that judgment, when it comes, will be one of terror in its effect. I ask for the reading of the dispatch from Louisiana which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, January 10, 1875—11.30 p. m.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Since the year 1866 nearly thirty-five hundred persons, a great majority of whom were colored men, have been killed and wounded in this State. In 1868 the official record shows that eighteen hundred and eighty-four were killed and wounded. From 1868 to the present time no official investigation has been made, and the civil authorities, in all but a few cases, have been unable to arrest, convict, and punish perpetrators. Consequently there are no correct records to be consulted for information. There is ample evidence, however, to show that more than twelve hundred persons have been killed and wounded during this time on account of their political sentiments. Frightful massacres have occurred in the parishes of Bossier Caddo, Catahoula, Saint Bernard, Saint Landry, Grant, and Orleans. The general character of the massacres in the above-named parishes is so well known that it is unnecessary to describe them.

The isolated cases can best be illustrated by the following instances, which I take from a mass of evidence now lying before me of men killed on account of their political principles: In Natchitoches Parish the number of isolated cases reported is thirty-three; in the parish of Bienville the number of men killed is thirty; in Red River Parish the isolated cases of men killed is thirty-four; in Winn Parish the number of isolated cases where men were killed is fifteen; in Jackson Parish the number killed is twenty; and in Catahoula Parish the number of isolated cases reported where men were killed is fifty; and most of the country parishes throughout the State will show a corresponding state of affairs. The following statements will illustrate the character and kind of these outrages:

On the 30th of August, 1874, in Red River Parish, six State and parish officers, named Twitchell, Divers, Holland, Howell, Edgerton, and Willis, were taken, together with four negroes, under guard to be carried out of the State, and were deliberately murdered on the 29th of August, 1874. The White League tried, sentenced, and hung two negroes on the 28th of August, 1874. Three negroes were shot and killed at Brownsville, just before the arrival of the United States troops in this parish. Two white-leaguers rode up to a negro cabin and called for a drink of water. When the old colored man turned to draw it, they shot him in the back and killed him. The courts were all broken up in this district, and the district judge driven out.

In the parish of Caddo, prior to the arrival of the United States troops, all of the officers at Shreveport were compelled to abdicate by the White League, which took possession of the place. Among those obliged to abdicate were Walsh, the mayor, Rapers, the sheriff, Wheaton, clerk of the court, Durant, the recorder, and Ferguson and Renfro, administrators. Two colored men, who had given evidence in regard to frauds committed in the parish, were compelled to flee for their lives, and reached this city last night, having been smuggled through in a cargo of cotton.

In the parish of Bossier the White League have attempted to force the abdication of Judge Baker, the United States commissioner and parish judge, together with O'Neal, the sheriff, and Walker, the clerk of the court; and they have compelled the parish and district courts to suspend operations. Judge Baker states that the white-leaguers notified him several times that if he became a candidate on the republican ticket, or if he attempted to organize the republican party, he should not live until election.

They also tried to intimidate him through his family by making the same threats to his wife, and when told by him that he was a United States commissioner they notified him not to attempt to exercise the functions of his office. In but few of the country parishes can it be truly said that the law is properly enforced, and in some of the parishes the judges have not been able to hold court for the past two years. Human life in this State is held so cheaply that when men are killed on account of political opinions, the murderers are regarded rather as heroes than as criminals in the localities where they reside, and by the White League and their supporters.

An illustratian of the ostracism that prevails in the State may be found in a resolution of a White League club in the parish of De Soto, which states, "That they pledge themselves under (no?) circumstances after the coming election, to employ, rent land to, or in any other manner give aid, comfort, or credit, to any man, white or black, who votes against the nominees of the white man's party." Safety for individuals who express their opinion in the isolated portions of this State has existed only when that opinion was in favor of the principles and party supported by the Ku-Klux and White League organizations. Only yesterday Judge Myers, the parish judge of the parish of Natchitoches, called on me upon his arrival in this city, and stated that in order to reach here alive he was obliged to leave his home by stealth, and after nightfall, and make his way to Little Rock, Arkansas, and come to this city by way of Memphis.

He further states that while his father was lying at the point of death in the same village, he was unable to visit him for fear of assassination, and yet he is a native of the parish, and proscribed for his political sentiments only. It is more than probable that if bad government has existed in this State it is the result of the armed organizations, which have now crystallized into what is called the White League; instead of bad government developing them, they have by their terrorism prevented to a considerable extent the collection of taxes, the holding of courts, the punishment of criminals, and vitiated public sentiment by familiarizing it with the scenes above described. I am now engaged in compiling evidence for a detailed report upon the above subject, but it will be some time before I can obtain all the requisite data to cover the cases that have occurred throughout the State. I will also report in due time upon the same subject in the States of Arkansas and Mississippi.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GORDON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I understand, however, that there was a remark made by him while I was out with reference to one district in Georgia. If he will permit me, I just want to state that there was no occasion for the casting of any republican votes in that district at all. There was no candidate to cast them for, and therefore it was not necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. No candidate for Congress?

Mr. GORDON. Not in the district to which the Senator referred, where there were only eighteen republican votes cast, as I understand he said.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator say that there was no candidate?

Mr. GORDON. There was no republican candidate at all in the district. It was carried before by a very large majority. There was but one candidate and he was a democrat.

Mr. LOGAN. Which district was that?

Mr. GORDON. The district to which I understand the Senator referred, of which H. R. HARRIS is the Representative.

Mr. LOGAN. The fourth and the eighth?

Mr. GORDON. The fourth is the district I refer to.

Mr. LOGAN. How about the eighth?

Mr. GORDON. In the eighth there was no candidate at all except Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

Mr. LOGAN. None at all?

Mr. GORDON. None at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Were there no county candidates?

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the county candidates had been elected at a previous election. It was a congressional election entirely in our State in November.

Mr. LOGAN. I only give the facts as they are of record, and of course there may be an exception which I know nothing about. I only take that from the record as I find it. I am always ready to be corrected if I am wrong in reference to anything, and I am glad to give the Senator the benefit of his correction, and that part of the statement was made under a misapprehension of the facts.

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask candid, honest, fair-minded men, after reading this report of General Sheridan showing the murder, not for gain, not for plunder, but for political opinions in the last few years of thirty-five hundred persons in the State of Louisiana, all of them republicans, not one of them a democrat—I want to ask if they can stand here before this country and defend the democratic party of Louisiana? I put this question to them, for they have been here for days crying against the wrongs upon the democracy of Louisiana. I want any one of them to tell me if he is prepared to defend the democracy of Louisiana. What is your democracy of Louisiana? You are excited, your extreme wrath is aroused at General Sheridan because he called your White Leagues down there "banditti." I ask you if the murder of thirty-five hundred men in a short time for political purposes by a band of men banded together for the purpose of murder does not make them banditti, what it does make them? Does it make them democrats? It certainly does not make them republicans. Does is make them honest men? It certainly does not. Does it make them law-abiding men? It certainly does not. Does it make them peaceable citizens? It certainly does not. But what does it make? A band of men banded together and perpetrating murder in their own State? Webster says a bandit is "a lawless or desperate fellow; a robber; a brigand," and "banditti" are men banded together for plunder and murder; and what are your White Leagues banded together for if the result proves that they are banded together for murder for political purposes?

O, what a crime it was in Sheridan to say that these men were banditti! He is a wretch. From the papers he ought to be hanged to a lamp-post; from the Senators he is not fit to breathe the free air of heaven or of this free Republic; but your murderers of thirty-five hundred people for political offenses are fit to breathe the air of this country and are defended on this floor to-day, and they are defended here by the democratic party, and you cannot avoid or escape the proposition. You have denounced republicans for trying to keep the peace in Louisiana; you have denounced the Administration for trying to suppress bloodshed in Louisiana; you have denounced all for the same purpose; but not one word has fallen from the lips of a solitary democratic Senator denouncing these wholesale murders in Louisiana. You have said, "I am sorry these things are done," but you have defended the White Leagues; you have defended Penn; you have defended rebellion; and you stand here to-day the apologists of murder, of rebellion, and of treason in that State.

I want to ask the judgment of an honest country, I want to ask the judgment of the moral sentiments of the law-abiding people of this grand and glorious Republic to tell me whether men shall murder by the score, whether men shall trample the law under foot, whether men shall force judges to resign, whether men shall force prosecuting attorneys to resign, whether men shall take five officers of a State out and hang or shoot them if they attempt to exercise the functions of their office, whether men shall terrify the voters and office-holders of a State, whether men shall undertake in violation of law to organize a Legislature for revolutionary purposes, for the purpose of putting a governor in possession and taking possession of the State and then ask the democracy to stand by them—I appeal to the honest judgment of the people of this land and ask them to respond whether this was not an excusable case when this man used the Army to protect the life of that State and to preserve the peace of that people? Sir, the man who will not use all the means in his power to preserve the nationality, the integrity of this Government, the integrity of a State or the peace and happiness of a people, is not fit to govern, he is not fit to hold position in this or any other civilized age.

Does liberty mean wholesale slaughter? Does republican government mean tyranny and oppression of its citizens? Does an intelligent and enlightened age of civilization mean murder and pillage, bloodshed at the hands of Ku-Klux or White Leagues or anybody else, and if any one attempts to put it down, attempts to reorganize and produce order where chaos and confusion have reigned, they are to be denounced as tyrants, as oppressors, and as acting against republican institutions? I say then the happy days of this Republic are gone. When we fail to see that republicanism means nothing, that liberty means nothing but the unrestrained license of the mobs to do as they please, then republican government is a failure. Liberty of the citizen means the right to exercise such rights as are prescribed within the limits of the law so that he does not in the exercise of these rights infringe the rights of other citizens. But the definition is not well made by our friends on the opposite side of this Chamber. Their idea of liberty is license; it is not liberty but it is license. License to do what? License to violate law, to trample constitutions under foot, to take life, to take property, to use the bludgeon and the gun or anything else for the purpose of giving themselves power. What statesman ever heard of that as a definition of liberty? What man in a civilized age has ever heard of liberty being the unrestrained license of the people to do as they please without any restraint of law or of authority? No man, no not one until we found the democratic party, would advocate this proposition and indorse and encourage this kind of license in a free country.

Mr. President, I have perhaps said more on this question of Louisiana than might have been well for me to say on account of my strength, but what I have said about it I have said because I honestly believed it. What I have said in reference to it comes from an honest conviction in my mind and in my heart of what has been done to suppress violence and wrong. But I have a few remarks in conclusion to submit now to my friends on the other side, in answer to what they have said not by way of argument but by way of accusation. You say to us—I had it repeated to me this morning in private conversation—"Withdraw your troops from Louisiana and you will have peace." Ah, I heard it said on this floor once "Withdraw your troops from Louisiana and your State government will not last a minute." I heard that said from the opposite side of the Chamber, and now you say "Withdraw your troops from Louisiana and you will have peace."

Mr. President, I dislike to refer to things that are past and gone; I dislike to have my mind called back to things of the past; but I well remember the voice in this Chamber once that rang out and was heard throughout this land, "Withdraw your troops from Fort Sumter if you want peace." I heard that said. Now it is "Withdraw your troops from Louisiana if you want peace." Yes, I say, withdraw your troops from Louisiana if you want a revolution, and that is what is meant. But, sir, we are told, and doubtless it is believed by the Senators who tell us so, who denounce the republican party that it is tyrannical, oppressive, and outrageous. They have argued themselves into the idea that they are patriots, pure and undefiled. They have argued themselves into the idea that the democratic party never did any wrong. They have been out of power so long that they have convinced themselves that if they only had control of this country for a short time, what a glorious country they would make it. They had control for nearly forty long years, and while they were the agents of this country—I appeal to history to bear me out—they made the Government a bankrupt, with rebellion and treason in the land, and were then sympathizing with it wherever it existed. That is the condition in which they left the country when they had it in their possession and within their control. But they say the republican party is a tyrant; that it is oppressive. As I have said, I wish to make a few suggestions to my friends in answer to this accusation—oppressive to whom? They say to the South that the republican party has tyrannized over the South. Let me ask you how has it tyrannized over the South?

Without speaking of our troubles and trials through which we passed, I will say this: at the end of a rebellion that scourged this land, that drenched it with blood, that devastated a portion of it, left us in debt and almost bankrupt, what did the republican party do? Instead of leaving these our friends and citizens to-day in a territorial condition where we might exercise jurisdiction over them for the next coming twenty years, where we might have deprived them of the rights of members on this floor, what did we do? We reorganized them into States, admitted them back into the Union, and through the clemency of the republican party we admitted representatives on this floor who had thundered against the gates of liberty for four bloody years. Is that the tyranny and oppression of which you complain at the hands of the republican party? Is that a part of our oppression against you southern people?

Let us go a little further. When the armed democracy, for that is what they were, laid down their arms in the Southern States, after disputing the right of freedom and liberty in this land for four years, how did the republican party show itself in its acts of tyranny and oppression toward you? You appealed to them for clemency. Did you get it? Not a man was punished for his treason. Not a man ever knocked at the doors of a republican Congress for a pardon who did not get it. Not a man ever petitioned the generosity of the republican party to be excused for his crimes who was not excused. Was that oppression upon the part of republicans in this land? Is that a part of the oppression of which you accuse us?

Let us look a little further. We find to-day twenty-seven democratic Representatives in the other branch of Congress who took arms in their hands and tried to destroy this Government holding commissions there by the clemency of the republican party. We find in this Chamber by the clemency of the republican party three Senators who held such commissions. Is that tyranny; is that oppression; is that the outrage of this republican party on you southern people? Sir, when Jeff Davis, the head of the great rebellion, who roams the land free as air, North, South, East, and West, makes democratic speeches wherever invited, and the vice-president of the southern rebellion holds his seat in the other House of Congress, are we to be told that we are tyrants, and oppressing the southern people? These things may sound a little harsh, but it is time to tell the truth in this country. The time has come to talk facts. The time has come when cowards should hide, and honest men should come to the front and tell you plain, honest truths. You of the South talk to us about oppressing you. You drenched your land in blood, caused weeping throughout this vast domain, covered the land in weeds of mourning both North and South, widowed thousands and orphaned many, made the pension-roll as long as an army-list, made the debt that grinds the poor of this land—for all these things you have been pardoned, and yet you talk to us about oppression. So much for the oppression of the republican party of your patriotic souls and selves. Next comes the President of the United States. He is a tyrant, too. He is an oppressor still, in conjunction with the republican party. Oppressor of what? Who has he oppressed of your Southern people, and when, and where? When your Ku-Klux, banded together for murder and plunder in the Southern States, were convicted by their own confession, your own representatives pleaded to the President and said, "Give them pardon, and it will reconcile many of the southern people." The President pardoned them; pardoned them of their murder, of their plunder, of their piracy on land; and for this I suppose he is a tyrant.

More than that, sir, this tyrant in the White House has done more for you southern people than you ought to have asked him to do. He has had confidence in you until you betrayed that confidence. He has not only pardoned the offenses of the South, pardoned the criminals of the democratic party, but he has placed in high official position in this Union some of the leading men who fought in the rebellion. He has put in his Cabinet one of your men; he has made governors of Territories of some of your leading men who fought in the rebellion; he has sent on foreign missions abroad some of your men who warred against this country; he has placed others in the Departments; and has tried to reconcile you in every way on earth, by appealing to your people, by recognizing them and forgiving them for their offenses, and for these acts of generosity, for these acts of kindness, he is arraigned to-day as a Cæsar, as a tyrant, as an oppressor.

Such kindness in return as the President has received from these people will mark itself in the history of generosity. O, but say they, Grant wants to oppress the White Leagues in Louisiana; therefore he is an oppressor. Yes, Mr. President, Grant does desire that these men should quit their every-day chivalric sports of gunning upon negroes and republicans. He asks kindly that you stop it. He says to you, "That is all I want you to do;" and you say that you are desirous that they shall quit it. You have but to say it and they will quit it. It is because you have never said it that they have not quit it. It is in the power of the democratic party to-day but to speak in tones of majesty, of honor, and justice in favor of human life, and your Ku-Klux and murderers will stop. But you do not do it; and that is the reason they do not stop. In States where it has been done they have stopped. But it will not do to oppress those people; it will not do to make them submit and subject them to the law; it will not do to stop these gentlemen in their daily sports and in their lively recreations. They are White Leagues; they are banded together as gentlemen; they are of southern blood; they are of old southern stock; they are the chivalry of days gone by; they are knights of the bloody shield; and the shield must not be taken from them. Sirs, their shield will be taken from them; this country will be aroused to its danger; this country will be aroused to do justice to its citizens; and when it does, the perpetrators of crime may fear and tremble. Tyranny and oppression! A people who without one word of opposition allows men who have been the enemies of a government to come into these legislative Halls and make laws for that government to be told that they are oppressors is a monstrosity in declamation and assertion. Whoever heard of such a thing before? Whoever believed that such men could make such charges? Yet we are tyrants!

[Mr. LOGAN here gave way to allow a message to be received from the House of Representatives, which announced the passage of a bill removing the political disabilities of John Withers, Joseph F. Minter, and William Kearney.]

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the reading of the title of that bill from the House only reminds me of more acts of tyranny and oppression of the republican party, and there is continuation of the same great offenses constantly going on in this Chamber. But some may say "It is strange to see Logan defending the President of the United States." It is not strange to me. I can disagree with the President when I think he is wrong; and I do not blame him for disagreeing with me; but when these attacks are made, coming from where they do, I am ready to stand from the rising sun in the morning to the setting sun at evening to defend every act of his in connection with this matter before us.

I may have disagreed with President Grant in many things; but I was calling attention to the men who have been accusing him here, on this floor, on the stump, and in the other House; the kind of men who do it, the manner of its doing, the sharpness of the shafts that are sent at him, the poisonous barbs that they bear with them, and from these men who, at his hands, have received more clemency than any men ever received at the hands of any President or any man who governed a country. Why, sir, I will appeal to the soldiers of the rebel army to testify in behalf of what I say in defense of President Grant—the honorable men who fought against the country, if there was honor in doing it. What will be their testimony? It will be that he captured your armed democracy of the South, he treated them kindly, turned them loose, with their horses, with their wagons, with their provisions; treated them as men, and not as pirates. Grant built no prison-pens for the southern soldiers; Grant provided no starvation for southern men; Grant provided no "dead-lines" upon which to shoot southern soldiers if they crossed them; Grant provided no outrageous punishment against these people that now call him a tyrant. Generous to a fault in all his actions toward the men who were fighting his country and destroying the Constitution, that man to-day is denounced as a very Cæsar!

Sherman has not been denounced, but the only reason is that he was not one of the actors in this transaction; but I want now to say to my friends on the other side, especially to my friend from Delaware, who repeated his bitter denunciation against Sheridan yesterday—and I say this in all kindness, because I am speaking what future history will bear me out in—when Sheridan and Grant and Sherman, and others like them, are forgotten in this country, you will have no country. When the democratic party is rotten for centuries in its grave, the life, the course, the conduct of these men will live as bright as the noonday sun in the heart of every patriot of a republic like the American Union. Sirs, you may talk about tyranny, you may talk about oppression, you may denounce these men; their glory may fade into the darkness of night; but that darkness will be a brilliant light compared with the darkness of the democratic party. Their pathway is illuminated by glory; yours by dark deeds against the Government. That is a difference which the country will bear witness to in future history when speaking of this country and the actors on its stage.

Now, Mr. President, I have a word to say about our duty. A great many people are asking, what shall we do? Plain and simple in my judgment is the proposition. I say to republicans, do not be scared. No man is ever hurt by doing an honest act and performing a patriotic duty. If we are to have a war of words outside or inside, let us have them in truth and soberness, but in earnest. What, then, is our duty? I did not believe that in 1872 there were official data upon which we could decide who was elected governor in Louisiana. But this is not the point of my argument. It is that the President has recognized Kellogg as governor of that State, and he has acted for two years. The Legislature of the State has recognized him; the supreme court of the State has recognized him; one branch of Congress has recognized him. The duty is plain, and that is for this, the other branch of Congress, to do it, and that settles the question. Then, when it does it, your duty is plain and simple, and as the President has told you, he will perform his without fear, favor, or affection. Recognize the government that revolution has been against and intended to overthrow, and leave the President to his duty, and he will do it. That is what to do.

Sir, we have been told that this old craft is rapidly going to pieces; that the angry waves of dissension in the land are lashing against her sides. We are told that she is sinking, sinking, sinking to the bottom of the political ocean. Is that true? Is it true that this gallant old party, that this gallant old ship that has sailed through troubled seas before is going to be stranded now upon the rock of fury that has been set up by a clamor in this Chamber and a few newspapers in the country? Is it true that the party that saved this country in all its great crises, in all its great trials, is sinking to-day on account of its fear and trembling before an inferior enemy? I hope not. I remember, sir, once I was told that the old republican ship was gone; but when I steadied myself on the shores bounding the political ocean of strife and commotion, I looked afar off and there I could see a vessel bounding the boisterous billows with white sail unfurled, marked on her sides "Freighted with the hopes of mankind," while the great Mariner above, as her helmsman, steered her, navigated her to a haven of rest, of peace, and of safety. You have but to look again upon that broad ocean of political commotion to-day, and the time will soon come when the same old craft, provided with the same cargo, will be seen, flying the same flag, passing through these tempestuous waves, anchoring herself at the shores of honesty and justice, and there she will lie undisturbed by strife and tumult, again in peace and safety. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I feel grateful in view of the speech of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that he did not go into the rebellion. What a power he would have been against us if he had ever landed there! I am happy that he entered early into the cause of the Union and stood by the flag throughout the war. I am happy of another thing, and it is this, that Demosthenes died early so that he cannot come in competition with the honorable Senator for the garland of universal approbation as a close and logical orator. [Laughter.]

Sir, the honorable Senator from Illinois yesterday told us that he was a sailor and gave us a delineation of what was a sailor's duty. I have since discovered that he was not only a sailor, but that the highest evidence that we have of his nautical ability is simply the manner in which he sails in, and further that the kind of vessel that he has commanded for the last two days is a mud-scow, a dredge-boat, only fit to operate upon the Missouri or the murky Mississippi washing his own State. [Laughter.]

I have further, however, to congratulate him on the amount of aid that came to his relief on yesterday. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] visited the Senator on the floor yesterday, I suppose to give him aid and sympathy and to prompt him where it might be necessary. That was all right and proper. And while I had a little feeling on the subject for a moment, thinking this was ex-officiousness on the part of his friends, I was consoled with the remembrance that after the 4th of March that honorable Senator will be checkmated in this body by a democratic colleague.

I believe that the honorable Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] also visited the honorable Senator from Illinois, stepped into the wheel-house in order to suggest something in regard to the navigation of the vessel. I allow him what enjoyment he can gain from assisting in navigating the vessel at the present time, for he, too, is to be checkmated after the 4th of March with an independent-republican colleague from the State of California. Then there will be some other gentlemen navigating crafts.

I also discovered yesterday, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WIND-OM] felt it necessary to do something for the benefit of this Illinois navigator; and therefore the honorable Senator [Mr. WIND-OM] advanced and furnished him with wind at a time when he seemed to be in a critical condition. [Laughter.] And when the day had far disappeared and when the hour for hitch-ing up the boat had come, before she was yet up to the shore my colleague over the way, Mr. HITCH-COCK, advancing seized the cable and carried it out on shore, and thus they landed the gentleman's craft last evening, and then he commenced to wood and water for another sail to-day. From the length of time that the vessel has run to-day, I fancy that the wood has been the product of the Mississippi Valley, cotton-wood, and produced very little valuable steam.

All our opponents seem to have taken to the water lately. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] told us the other day that he too was on a ship, and he told us that he was going down with the ship. I do not doubt his veracity; I think that is a fact, [laughter;] and all I have to say is the greater pity for the ship, unless she has heretofore been a pirate, and then it serves her right to let them go down with her.

But there seems to be no safety on land since the October and November elections, for balloting is generally done on land. The honorable Senator from Illinois thought he needed the aid of other friends this morning. After he had put in evidence here everything but Webster's Dictionary, and would have put that in only it changes the subject so often, [laughter]—after he had done that he calls upon the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] and asks him if he has any old letter about him or anything of the kind that he would furnish to him. [Great laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Persons on the floor of the Senate will preserve order or the floor will be cleared.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois made yesterday and to-day the point, with a great degree of force and energy, that certain audacious editors are charging that there have been frauds committed in this country. So far as that question of frauds is concerned, frauds at the ballot-box, frauds of other characters, I have this to say: I take the statement of the honorable Senator that he is capable—and he demonstrates in the manner in which he has done it the fact that he is capable—of grappling with this question of fraud, for I have at my desk a congressional report with the evidence of one who was examined in this Louisiana case; and after the man had sworn that he had committed frauds too great for belief, only for the apparent honesty of the witness, when he was interrogated by the honorable Senator as to where he learned ballot-box stuffing, "Why," said he, "general, in your State and your district." [Laughter.] Therefore I have no doubt but that the honorable Senator is very well prepared to discuss the question of fraud.

He told us yesterday, if I remember correctly, that he would discuss the subject in a just and honest and legal manner. Mr. President, if his notes had been written on legal cap he might have made some claim, and just that much, to a legal argument; but inasmuch as they were written on fool's cap, I think it is a little "too thin."

Mr. President, I thought the time for prompting had gone by, and I am astounded, therefore, to see the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] making his way to my friend from Illinois. Perhaps it is only upon account of sympathy in point of locality, not at all for the purpose of prompting him to another burst of native eloquence.

The honorable Senator says that there is no objection to the present condition of things in the State of Louisiana. Now I desire the Chief Clerk to read that which I send him from the Chronicle of the 12th instant. It is a description of what the Chronicle says is to be the report that is to be made to the country on the subject of these Louisiana affairs. Let the whole article be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE LOUISIANA COMMITTEE.

The full Committee on Southern Affairs met this morning to confer with the sub-committee who went to New Orleans to investigate the condition of affairs in Louisiana. It is indicated through the evidence submitted that they will report—First, that at the late election in Louisiana there was no intimidation of colored voters; second, that the White League discussed, but voted down, a proposition to discharge servants who voted the republican ticket; third, that the returning board was a fraud; fourth, that the United States troops executed orders issued by Marshal Packard on election day; fifth, that the disorder in the Louisiana Legislature had ceased, and the meeting was entirely orderly and quiet at the time General De Trobriand entered the hall to arrest the members; sixth, that the only request Speaker Wiltz made of General De Trobriand was to keep order in the lobby outside of the hall; seventh, that the people of Louisiana generally have no sympathy with the Kellogg government, and that colored men who say they are national republicans proclaimed themselves as State democrats in order to get rid of Kellogg; eighth, that the police in New Orleans is demoralized.

It has already been stated in the Chronicle that there is some dissatisfaction with the manner in which the sub-committee sent to New Orleans have acted, and it is proposed that the entire committee shall visit Louisiana. All through the investigation it was apparent that the master spirit was a democrat. Should the full committee go to New Orleans, a more extended hearing will be given to both sides. It is urged that this action is rendered necessary in view of the recent violent assaults on the Government and General Sheridan as its agent. But there is a feeling that the legislation of this Congress should not be confined alone to Louisiana, but that a general measure should be passed which will aid in the maintenance of peace throughout the entire South. The conclusions reached by the Louisiana sub-committee are not in accord with the republican sentiment in the House, but no purpose exists to harshly criticise their report.

Mr. TIPTON. Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the country to the fact, that one of the organs of the Administration in this city declares that an investigation has taken place in Louisiana; that that investigation has been made by a committee, and that that committee is now ready to say that there was no intimidation of colored voters in the last election; they are ready to say also that the returning board was a fraud; they are ready to say also that the United States troops executed orders issued by Marshal Packard on the day of election; they are ready to say also that the people of Louisiana generally have no sympathy with the Kellogg government; they are ready to say also that the police in New Orleans is demoralized. But the editor of the paper says that although that is to be the report of the committee, it is not in accordance with the sentiments of the republican party, and therefore it is not to be made as a report, but that other men are to be sent to Louisiana for the purpose of manufacturing a report I suppose that shall be in accordance with the sentiments of the republican party!

That in itself is one of the most humiliating evidences of the condition of our country that could be exhibited to the Senate or to the country, that after an investigation is made exonerating to a very great extent and almost entirely the conservative people of the State of Louisiana, this editor says it is not to be presented here as an official document, because it is not in accordance with the sentiments of the republican party. O, no; but it is in accordance with the sentiments of the republican party if a committee shall go to Louisiana and say that, instead of being a fraud, the count of the returning board was fair and honest. Here the President of the United States can send us a report himself; he can make it from what material he chooses; but his republican editor here tells us that a sub-committee went from this Congress and brought in a report exonerating the conservatives of Louisiana, and that it shall not be made, but one shall be brought here from the whole committee that will be in accordance with the sentiments of the republican party!

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois has been very much excited because somebody has talked about the oppression of the republican party. He denies that there is such a thing as tyranny in the republican party. Very well; he only can speak, I suppose, for the body that he is connected with in this Chamber. Two years ago he gave you his opinion of the tyranny of the republican party in the Senate, and if he had been connected with the Army he might have discussed the character of Army officers; if he had been connected with office-holders outside he might learnedly have discussed their characters. But he was intimate with the Senate, and he knew that the Senate stood here the great correcting instrumentality of the republican party of the country, and he turned his attention to the Senate; and I will give the country the benefit to-day of his deliberate opinion on the subject of what the republican party was just two years ago. The honorable Senator then said in a speech in this Chamber:

> By calling your little meetings and seeking to direct everybody no man can be an independent man in this Senate.

I think his course in this debate has illustrated his opinion of it two years ago. "No man," said he then, "can be an independent man in this Senate."

> Why, sir? If he gets out of the traces the least bit, according to a certain few, you call a caucus on him, [laughter;] you will settle him at once. Then you will send it out to the country that he is not obeying the dictates of a republican caucus—a caucus about what? A caucus to advance the interests of the country? No, sir; but a caucus to advance the interests of individuals and to strike down others; and if a man refuses to vote as you direct he is counted out. I must admit that there are not very many gentlemen who like to jump against a caucus. I have always been strange in my notions, and especially in not doing what others try to force me to do; and I say to you now that I shall vote for the resolutions again in this Senate if they are offered irrespective of caucuses or anything else, because I think it is right.
> But to run a party you must have a caucus. If some Senator does not vote for a resolution that some other Senator offers, you are to call a caucus. If he votes against something that somebody else has offered, call a caucus and settle him by your caucus. It reminds me a good deal of school-boys playing marbles, and some chap in the crowd happens to strike what they call the "middle man" a little more centrally than the rest, and they get together and read him out of the game, and take his marbles and play at the game themselves. [Laughter.] This is what you call honest political action, and every man who does not come up to the mark must be read out, and I am one of them.

He said they read independent men out of the party, and he was one of them. I infer from what he has said to us these two days that if he was out he has got back again.

He charges also fraud, and goes back to the days of the Kansas-Nebraska bill and before that and subsequent to that, in order to satisfy you that the democratic party have not a clear record on the subject of national outrages. Let me tell the honorable Senator that when a democratic administration attacked the Territory of Kansas the same feeling—thank God for it—the same identical feeling was elicited in this country that was elicited when you attacked Louisiana. Let me tell that Senator further, that the crime was insignificant in the attack upon Kansas to what it is in regard to Louisiana. One was a Territory; the other is a State. But from the very hour that attack was made, the demand was made to organize the republican party. It met in convention; it called upon every man to unite with it who agreed with it on the question of restraining slavery, although you may differ with us on everything else. That latitude was given, and the party was organized in order to checkmate an administration which had not done half as much in the way of intimidation and tyranny and corruption as the republican party has done in regard to the State of Louisiana. That call was made; that call was responded to; and we understand what was the result in the country. I say here now that if the slaveholders of this country had become alarmed at that Chicago movement which nominated Frémont at the call for the republican party, at the defection from the standard of the old democracy by so many men who went into the republican organization at that time—if the slaveholders of the country had thereupon emancipated their slaves, the mission of the republican party would have been fulfilled that hour, that day, and there would have been an end of the organization. Why? Because the organization held in it free-traders and tariff men as well; the organization held in it men of every diverse political view in the whole country; and it was not expected that they would remain together one hour after the object was accomplished for which they were organized.

But that did not occur. Then came the war. Then came the proclamation of emancipation. Then the republican party began to feel that its mission was pretty well ended now that emancipation had taken place. But the party stood together for the purposes of reconstruction, saying that that was a matter which legitimately might belong to the closing labors of the great and dominant republican party. Just as soon as reconstruction was finished, reconstruction brought into this Chamber all Senators republican; reconstruction sent all Representatives, as far as I remember, to the House republican. The whole reconstructed country was in the hands of the republican party. What of that? It had this influence upon those of us who had been participating in reconstruction; we began to discover that unless we did something more than merely reconstruct those States, they would soon be voting for the democratic party or whatever ticket they chose to vote. We had sent down there a great many carpet-baggers, and they had been so distasteful to the country that their lives could not be preserved unless something was done for them. We determined, at that point, to hold our political power in this country, first by legislation from Congress which should so trammel the people of the reconstructed States as that they would be literally compelled to continue to vote the republican ticket. That was tried in the case of the admission of Virginia. Although the President told us that Virginia had adopted a constitution republican in form, that Virginia had ratified the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, that was nothing. Gentlemen were afraid that Virginia would go back to democracy some day. Therefore they said, "If we admit her, suppose she has a republican constitution; what of that? Suppose she has ratified the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments; what of that? Let us admit her with a condition precedent, some condition that will hereafter hold her to the car of the republican party." I said "No, sir." Other republicans on the floor of the Senate said "No, sir." All the democrats in both Houses of Congress said "No, sir;" and it could not be consummated.

Then came Mississippi, and the proposition came I believe from Missouri—I think from the Senator whose term some time since expired, and we can infer what would be his sentiment—and it was to tie up Mississippi on the question of education. I said in my place here, "You cannot tie up Mississippi any more than you can tie up Massachusetts;" and from that time forward I held the position that all we had to do was to reinstate those States in the Union and leave them to perform their duties under the constitution of the State and the Constitution of the United States without any legislative interference on our part. Those men in the South, our new-born republicans, fancied that we had power to do everything for them, and after Bullock had been elected two years governor in Georgia he found that the democracy was going to vote him out of power, and he came to this Chamber in the very spirit and making the demand of those exceptionable carpet-baggers of the South; for in all the rule of political infamy no man bears so conspicuous a name as Bullock, who was the idol of many gentlemen here a few years ago. Congress would not finally legislate him into office again. He wanted us to perpetuate him for two years, and he thought the democracy would be so humbled that he could come as Senator or that he could be governor; that the power would remain with him. You dared not do it. Some of you tried to do it, but you were met at every step with discussion on that question, and you failed.

The next thought was, "If we cannot control Senators, we can do it by legislating in advance." Blodgett was elected then by a Legislature which was not competent to touch a United States Senator. That game was played, and he came here with his credentials and had the audacity to ask that he be admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States. Some were for him, others were against him. He failed.

Then the question was, "Cannot the Army do something for us?" and from that time forward demoralization has so swept over the republican party that the consequence was that your numbers were fading away, and now you are left in a hopeless minority in the next House of Representatives from which you cannot recover—such a change produced as never before was witnessed in any country. From one hundred of a majority you are left in the minority, with sixty or perhaps seventy of a majority dominating, and I apprehend will be in time domineering over you. How is it here? Power had been departing, gradually passing away, and after a while Georgia sent democratic Senators, and after a while Virginia sent democratic Senators here, and after a while they came from other Southern States, until Kellogg, now in the last ebb of his expiring despotism, says to the President—and this is a precious document and gets the very first place in the message:

> Louisiana is now the last State in the Southwest, except Mississippi, that remains true to the republican party. We have a large majority of the legal voters of the State. Even our opponents now admit it, and, refuting their own often-repeated assertions of last year that a heavy colored vote was polled for the fusion candidates, assert in their published call that all efforts to persuade the colored element to unite with them have failed, and consequently that other means must be resorted to.

This, then, is a little history of how the power was departing and how reluctant you were to let it go. In God's name, in this solemn presence, how was it that even for a moment any respectable white Senator could have had effrontery to talk about holding a people by political power, by political office, by political legislation, by the use of the American Army? About that time it occurred that Louisiana was likely to go into an election and send democratic Senators here. What then? Mr. Kellogg was a Senator occupying a seat on this side of this Chamber. Kellogg told his brethren here that he thought the only way to carry the State would be for him to return home and become a candidate for governor. He went home and became a candidate for governor, and he pledged himself, I am very certain, to many of you "It will all be well, and I will not vacate my place here unless it is certain a republican can take it; I will not go out of office simply for the bubble of a governorship unless I can leave a republican at my desk." You all know about it; for would any of you resign to-day if the probabilities were that a democrat would come in your place? You will not probably resign, but the probabilities are that all your places will go as all these places are going at the present time. [Laughter.]

But Kellogg went there to take care of the State of Louisiana, and how did he perform his part? Did he undertake to go to the people merely with arguments such as the honorable Senator from Illinois would give an audience—cool, logical, dispassionate, with a perfect chain of analysis and ratiocination? Did he do that? No, sir. He went down to the State of Louisiana, and the first place you found him was in the custom-house. He went into the custom-house first, perhaps because it was a place of personal safety. The spirit and the chivalry of these Louisianians have sent him to that custom-house two or three times since, and will again unless his life is prolonged beyond the existence of the custom-house or something else takes place stranger than that lightning should strike him.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TIPTON. "The Senator" cannot hear. His voice is getting so husky that he cannot hear anything on that side of the Chamber. [Laughter.] When he got down to Louisiana he commenced a correspondence with the President of the United States, and in that correspondence he laid before the President the fact that politics was getting very shaky in Louisiana, and that unless that great municipality was taken care of the devil was to pay in all the Louisianas. He wrote his letter to the President and the President sent the letter here to enlighten us, and it has enlightened us amazingly. I ask you to connect this with Kellogg going out to help that expiring power of our republican party. He says to the President:

In the mean time Governor Warmoth has called an extra session of the legislature, and it is believed by many for the purpose of having the result of the recent election declared in favor of the democratic party, the supreme judges impeached, (unless previously forcibly removed,) and measures taken to stamp out the last vestige of republicanism in the State.

He goes on to describe the character of Warmoth, that he was not by any means a very loyal republican. Then he says to the President—

Should the United States circuit court, in passing upon the question of contempt of its orders by Governor Warmoth, which is carried along with the main case, decide against him, and should it further issue its mandates in aid of what we believe to be the right in the controversy, the following may result:

Our returning board being held as the legal returning board, and as in nowise affected by the promulgation of the recent election bill, may make the returns required by law, which will show the republican State ticket elected, and a republican majority in the Legislature; and on the 9th of December, when the Legislature convened by Governor Warmoth meets in extra session, a conflict may ensue.

I have thought it best to make a statement of the facts, so that you may be advised in any contingency likely to arise.

I ought to mention that the supreme court will next Monday pass upon the case of Bovee, ejected over a year ago from the office of secretary of state by Governor Warmoth, without any legal right or showing. They will reinstate him in the office.

The Senator from Wisconsin, now absent, [Mr. CARPENTER,] who has stood here the persistent friend of Louisiana, so far as a re-election is concerned, has said in a speech in our hearing in this body, and which has gone to the country, that he believed that these courts were in collusion with Kellogg, and had ruled and would rule anything Kellogg desired; and before they had made a decision, Kellogg tells the President, through Attorney-General Williams, "When that decision comes it will give us a majority; it will reinstate our men in office;" and he understood exactly, therefore, that they were about to take possession of the State under the court's decisions that had not yet come.

You will at once appreciate the full effect of this point.

It is impossible to state, at this time, to what extent there may be danger of collision, but if it should be apparent that a conflict will result, it seems to me that General Emory should be instructed to exercise a discretion in having troops in the vicinity of the capitol on that day.

I can readily understand the delicacy of the President's position in this matter; but it must not be forgotten that this is a systematic and organized attempt to destroy the republican party in this State.

That man was calling upon the President for the Army, and telling the President that there was great necessity for the Army, for he thought the political party with which he was identified would get the worst of it if the President did not send him the Army! He then says:

I therefore respectfully suggest that General Emory, who I think appreciates the necessity and sympathizes with the republican party—

Would be a very good person to come down and help carry on the revolution. "Carry on the revolution" is my own phrase. He then says:

In conclusion, let me say that should the United States courts hold with us, and if I can count upon the co-operation and sympathy of the Federal Government as far as it can be consistently given in aid of its firm and devoted friends in this State, who have done all they could to carry the State and have really carried it by a large majority against organized fraud, the State may be saved to the republican party for the future.

There, sir, after this man gets home to Louisiana he goes into a correspondence with the President of the United States, through the Attorney-General, and says that he thinks the State can be saved to the republican party in the future if he will give them the benefit of the Army—a political revolution, and the missives passing between the White House here and the custom-house in New Orleans. Whom did Mr. Kellogg draw into this correspondence with him? He drew into the correspondence with him the collector of the port of New Orleans. What did that collector in New Orleans say about this subject of a political revolution being wrought out down there by the Army? He wrote to the President and asked for arms; and the first thing he says:

President GRANT:

Parties interested in the success of the democratic party, particularly the New Orleans Times, are making desperate efforts to array the people against us.

And that done in the custom-house in the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, in the year 1872 of the Christian era, and under the Constitution of the United States—a request made for arms, and intervention on the part of the Federal Government, from the brother-in-law to the President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army. For what? For military aid, because a democratic editor, not having the fear of republicanism before his eyes, is attempting "to array the people against us!" Then he became pathetic, and his tender heart was moved with unutterable sensibility, and he says:

Old citizens are dragooned into an opposition they do not feel.

Pity for the "old citizens;" these old, aristocratic slaveholders of New Orleans! He says they are dragooned, these old, venerable men, into expressing an opposition which they do not feel. Can you not let us have the Army to relieve these old veterans of Louisiana? Then he speaks in behalf of the Legislature. He says to the President, "Our members are poor, our adversaries are rich, and offers are made that are difficult for them to withstand." Yes, the moneyed men of Louisiana were attempting to bribe his Legislature away, and he had such a high estimate of their political virtue that he thought if the President did not send him down an army to interpose between them and the offerers of bribes, they would take the hog and hominy, leave legislative duties, and go home!

Then he adds some other very cogent reasons why the President of the United States ought to give an army to his friends in Louisiana:

The delay in placing the troops at the disposal of Governor Pinchback, in accordance with joint resolution of Monday, is disheartening our friends and cheering our enemies. If requisition of Legislature is complied with all difficulty will be dissipated.

What then? Peace in the United States, the Constitution more firmly enthroned, the constitution of Louisiana saved? No, sir; but "the party will be saved, and everything go on smoothly."

If this is done, the tide will be turned at once in our favor. The real underlying sentiment is with us if it can but be encouraged. Governor Pinchback is acting with great discretion, as is the Legislature, and they will so continue.

I have now read every word of that dispatch. It is signed, not by a private citizen, but it is signed "James F. Casey, collector." There was then an official dispatch from the collector, officially addressed to the President of the United States, that for political reasons and to save that sinking republican party in Louisiana they wanted him to be so kind, so affable, so condescending in the plenitude of his power as to send them down an army to save the republican party.

Whom else did this man Kellogg in this conspiracy consort with? He consorted with Governor Pinchback of Louisiana. I believe that name is descriptive of some species of jewelry. Whether it is in regard to the color or the solidity of the article I am not certain. Well, this is a jewel in its way. Governor Pinchback sends to the President resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana calling upon the President of the United States for aid, and he asks him to hurry it up, for all is quiet here; and that is the conclusion of the dispatch—"All is quiet here." Then the Legislature of Louisiana, that had been put down as overawed, were calling on the President of the United States for an army, intimating to him—they seem to have thought that if they intimated there would be any fighting the President would be likely to lose his men, and they thought they could overcome his scruples in regard to the slaughter of his soldiers by saying, "Send down your soldiers here; all is quiet; nobody will shoot them, nobody will assassinate them." That was the language of Governor Pinchback. The President yielded to this demand, but he did not yield immediately. They got together among themselves, and they concluded if they had the Army they could not do anything with the Army unless they had some other matters arranged beforehand. What was to be done there? "We will have to do something now with the returns of the election." How did they get the election returns? A witness says in the testimony before the Senate that he heard twenty or thirty of them about the custom-house say that they intended, after the election was over, to get up affidavits enough to break it down. The witness testifies that they got up affidavits before the election was over, and filled them up in blank, and carried them out over the whole country; and one of the witnesses swears that General Sypher's brother wrote to him and said, "The General is lacking about three hundred votes, I think;" and then he starts out to supply the deficiency, and after he comes in the board is in session, and he enters with thirteen hundred forged and perjured certificates; and when he comes up with that armful of certificates and lays them down before the august and honest returning board of Louisiana, they ask him, "How many?" "Why," said he, "thirteen hundred." "Why," said they to him, "Jacques, you're a hell of a fellow." [Laughter.] Said he, "George, if you want any more, I can have you some by to-morrow morning at ten o'clock." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I pause in the presence of such a scene. I stand here that you may reflect that in a country which has been purchased by patriot blood, in a country where law once was respected, in a country where a great party have had power, in a State of the Union, men in constant correspondence with the White House—I mean with the President of the United States—should have been engaged in a conspiracy so bold, so terribly demoralizing; and yet a party claiming common decency sits before the country never ready to stamp the infamy with the seal of their disapprobation—never, never. That was done; that was sworn to. Then they were getting along with manufacturing testimony for the purpose of making good the pledge of Kellogg to his friends that he would see that the State of Louisiana was taken care of. What next? They had to find somebody who could make returns for them. The governor of the State had the returns and Kellogg was a Senator yet. Here is my evidence, this sworn testimony taken and reported by the Carpenter committee to the Senate. [Exhibiting a volume.] They never had a return, they never saw a return. They got together. They asked one man, "You are a newspaper editor?" "Yes, sir." "From Posey County?" "Yes sir." "What do you think, now, if we had the returns, would be the development?" "Well," said the fellow, "I think that we republicans ought to have carried the county, because we wanted to very much." Well, put down Posey County, then, carried for the republicans. They take a newspaper statement and they come to the conclusion, "Well, according to that newspaper editor, and he has a respectable-looking journal anyhow, we presume he is an intelligent man, we may as well put down Jones County also for the republicans." They take these thirteen hundred certificates brought in at one time by a gentleman formerly from Illinois, and they count them up to help somebody else out, and so they go through, and then they have the cold, unblushing audacity to come to the Senate of the United States and talk about having been elected and of their rights. Their reports and figures went into the hands of a committee, I believe the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was the chairman of the committee, and they made a report.

Messrs. CARPENTER, LOGAN, ALCORN, and ANTHONY signed a report to the Senate of the United States saying that these people never had any returns; and witnesses were before us who swore that they set out to make a republican Legislature and they said they intended to do it. I think that was the fact. They asked a witness why it was they did such things in Louisiana. "Because we were urged from Washington," said he. "We did a great many little things, perhaps, that we might not otherwise have done." Ah! has there been no conspiracy between officials in Washington and officials in Louisiana? It has been a cool, deliberate, audacious conspiracy all the way through. That assertion is nothing in comparison with the mine of testimony that has been given to the country, corruption teeming from one end of it to the other; and that is the manner in which they got their Legislature. From that Legislature they said that Kellogg was governor; they said that Antoine was lieutenant-governor; they said that Clinton was treasurer; they said that Pinchback was elected to the House of Representatives and also elected to the Senate; and he came here and put in his plea and his petition was advocated in the Senate, and he put it in also in the House of Representatives. There was a man in this Yankee age of ours able to be a Senator and able to be a Representative at the same time, and he is canvassing now in the House of Representatives for a seat there and canvassing in the Senate for a seat here. How do you like that as far as you have gone? [Laughter.] I ask that question. That revolutionary convention did that.

But they had no place to put their Legislature after they got it reported in favor of, and what then? Then they commenced corresponding with the President of the United States again; and the substance of the correspondence was this: "We have got the Legislature, and we have got the courts where we want them, under our thumb, and if we could have a few military with them we might organize this affair, made up out of newspapers and forged and perjured affidavits. Can we get the Army?" Kellogg says to the President, "I know the delicacy that the President would have in acting." What did he mean by that? I do not know what he did mean; you do not know either. I will tell you what he might have meant. This and that put together mean this: The President is a candidate for re-election. The electors of Louisiana, perhaps, will turn the scale and decide the question. Therefore the President might have a little delicacy in taking a part which would perhaps be a strong instrument in seating him again in the White House. I do not think they will doubt on that question hereafter. Since they have lost New York, and lost Pennsylvania, and lost Indiana, and lost Missouri, and lost Ohio; since their losses are so great, I do not think that the electoral vote of Louisiana will be worth fighting for very much longer; and that is my hope of peace. These gentlemen now will ground their arms and say, "Well, we sustained you as long as we could, Kellogg; we are sorry to part with you; but the party has gone to the devil generally, and we cannot help it." [Laughter.]

The President sent them the military. What came of that? You know what came of that. Judge Durell, the aged and the venerable—for they say he is too old to impeach now, and he goes free—Judge Durell put on his legal cap and came to the conclusion, as soon as they told him that the President allowed the Army to aid the marshal to enforce the mandates of a court, that he would allow them to do the rest. Then he says by his action, "Let it be so; let the troops be stationed in the State-house of Louisiana." Where did he make that decision? He never had a court organized to do it; he never had a clerk near him to put the seal of the State to it. He went into his garret, and there, I hope without even the light of a tallow dip, in darkness—and yet he thought he saw very clearly—said, "Let the military at two o'clock go into the State-house and occupy it." No, he did not fix the time; he left it to their discretion, because he thought they could not get there before three; but they got in at two. The morning dawned, and the Army of the United States had control of a State-house; and a set of unmitigated political villains, cutthroats of the first water, had concocted a list of members to go in under the dictation of the United States. They walked in; they took possession of that hall. Then came a protest long and loud; but no, that Legislature promised to send a republican to sit over there where Kellogg had abandoned his seat and they proposed to send another republican for six years. We waited. They set their mill to grinding and then produced two Senators in a short time. But the people of Louisiana, where were they? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] said they were under the foot of a Federal judge. That Senator is not a liberal republican; that Senator is not a democrat in his political affiliation. He is the Vice-President of the United States pro tempore whenever our worthy Presiding Officer is absent. The highest honors in the gift of the Senate of the United States are showered upon him. He said here last summer, and how sad he said it, how tenderly he said it, "They put the State of Louisiana under the foot of a Federal judge;" and there were my countrymen and there were your countrymen. Had they one particle of American spirit about them how long would you expect them to remain under the foot of a Federal judge? Great God! The time came; the Army of the United States was withdrawn and a glorious revolution took place which shall make the names of the actors immortal in all time to come. All as one man rose up; they struck for the rights of a State under the foot of a Federal judge. Thank Heaven, not long. They rose in their might, and had the honorable Senator himself been governor of Louisiana he, too, would have been in ignominious flight under the protection of Brother-in-law Casey in the custom-house. There was a revolution not the foremost in time. It was a people rising up who were under the foot of a Federal judge. I glory in their patriotism. I stand here to claim what honor I may in being the advocate of a people who disposed of an act of tryranny, forgery, and perjury, but never broke in spirit for a moment—waited until in God's good time an opportunity should offer.

The honorable Senator wanted to punish somebody. If Illinois had been placed under the foot of a Federal judge, if fraudulent and perjured returns had been thrown in her face, and if for two years she had been held there by Federal bayonets, Illinois would have made herself glorious in the vindication of her outraged and trampled rights; and if the honorable Senator then should have undertaken to make his inflammatory speeches before the people of Illinois, he would perhaps be in as much danger of assassination as General Sheridan is to-day. The instruments were selected for the purpose of carrying out that contemplated revolution, just as the instruments are selected to-day. They were taken from the Army of the United States. It was General Emory in one case; it is General Sheridan in the other. But there was to be no compromise. Last winter while Congress was discussing the case of Louisiana a proposition for compromise was spoken of in Louisiana, in order that revolution might be averted, in order that a State might rise from under the foot of a Federal judge. What then? While there was any talk at all of compromise one of these minions of power, one of these associates of Kellogg in this robbery of the people, telegraphed from the city of Washington to New Orleans, and the dispatch that he sent there was such as I shall read you from page 3150 of the RECORD of last session. Packard was at the White House, and he sent the following dispatch home:

> Tell Kellogg to keep his shirt on. His talk of a compromise only irritates authorities. The only compromise is for members elected to go in and take their seats in the Legislature, and that excludes all contest. The McEnery government must be broken up as soon as Congress adjourns.

That is the language of the dispatch—tell Kellogg that the talk of compromise has the tendency to irritate authorities here. What did he mean by "authorities" here? When he speaks about authority he meant the President; he meant the Cabinet. The probability is he may have thought of the Senate and the House of Representatives, but I think not, for generally where questions arise between the Government and the State of Louisiana, as in this case, the correspondence having all been between the President and these men of Louisiana, the inference is clear and conclusive that what he meant by "authorities" was the President and Cabinet. They were irritated by the talk of a compromise. A few days ago there was a talk of compromise in Louisiana, and what have we? We have the universal denunciation of these men against the idea of a compromise. The honorable Senator from Illinois says the way to settle this is to acknowledge the validity of the Legislature that has sent a Senator here, and by his admission indorse the character of that administration. Then there is to be no compromise? That question has been before the Congress of the United States for two long, turbulent, distracted years. You have refused to admit the first Senator; you have refused to admit the second Senator. Your own colleague, the Senator from Wisconsin, introduced a bill for the purpose of reorganizing the State and for causing a new election in Louisiana. You have refused also to pass that bill, and consequently the whole responsibility is now coming upon the Congress of the United States. We, the friends of good government in Louisiana, have always had a large share of the Senate with us in sentiment. That is my candid opinion from all your action and from all your votes; but the power of the caucus is unlimited. Last summer, when you went into caucus to decide what questions of legislation should be acted upon for the balance of the session, there was no successful argument made in behalf of this measure, and therefore this measure dropped and other questions had the precedence. What took place, so sharp, so excited, so magnificent, on the 14th day of last September would not have taken place if you had taken action. But as soon as the people of Louisiana were once more in the possession of a government that they claimed they had elected themselves, they discovered that the Army of the United States was declared at the disposition of Kellogg, and a second attack was thus made upon their liberties. The people of Louisiana, in rising and asserting their authority, never for one moment stood against the authority of the United States Government. They had nothing to say against the flag of their country; they had nothing to say against the commands of a general who was sent against them; but they, under a protest, gave up their governorship, gave up the State government, and went back into the ranks of the people again, determined not to dispute with the Government of the United States, but always ready to dispute with an armed faction that had them under the foot of a Federal judge.

There is no use in blinking this question. You will have no peace in the State of Louisiana while you are holding that people under the feet of Federal judges. Whenever you give them an opportunity of voting as you give other people an opportunity of voting, without the intervention of the Army, then and not till then may you expect peace and quiet in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HAGER. With the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from California to withdraw his motion for a moment. There is, I understand, a message on the table from the President of the United States, for the reading of which I will ask if it concerns the convenience of the Senator from Nebraska not to proceed now.

Mr. HAGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TIPTON. I have so used up my voice in speaking the short time I have that it is extremely difficult for me to complete my remarks this evening, and therefore I would rather have an opportunity of concluding them in the morning than undertake to conclude them at this hour in the present condition of my voice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business withdrawn?

Mr. HAGER. Did I understand that the Senator from New York had some other matter to present before the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask for the reading of the message on topics of finance and revenue from the President of the United States, which, I am told, lies on the table.

Mr. TIPTON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask, then, that the message be read.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that is done I claim the indulgence of the Senate for a moment, not in response to any part of my friend's speech, which I consider entirely unanswerable; but when he first commenced he interrogated me about the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] whispering to me. Merely to relieve his mind as to what the matter was, I will have a dispatch read——

Mr. TIPTON. I have yielded, Mr. President, for no such purpose. I have yielded for the one purpose contemplated by the Senator from New York; and if the Senator from New York withdraws his motion, I will proceed.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator cannot allow me to have a dispatch read to show what we were talking about——

Mr. TIPTON. I do not think I can at this time. I yielded to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to read it for his information?

Mr. TIPTON. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. It might be of great advantage to his speech.

Mr. TIPTON. I will attend to it after my speech is done, [laughter,] and will be amply able to attend to it after my speech is done.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; nobody doubts that.

Mr. TIPTON. Then suppose you withhold it.

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody ever questioned that of a man of your ability. I will only say that the Senator has either got to yield the floor or keep it. If he yields the floor, I claim that I have it.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, you have allowed me to yield the floor for the express purpose of the object contemplated by the Senator from New York, and I can trust your honor in reclaiming the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has yielded the floor with the understanding that he is to have it in the morning. He has nothing more to do with it this afternoon. He is to go on and finish his speech in the morning. The floor now belongs to the Senate.

Mr. TIPTON. The Senator from Nebraska has yielded the floor for no other purpose than that stated. His voice has greatly improved in the last two minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have not at any time declined to yield the floor for the purpose contemplated by the honorable Senator from New York, and am ready again to yield the floor for that purpose and for no other, unless to adjourn or to go into executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be done according to the rules. You cannot bargain the floor.

Mr. TIPTON. That was done last evening for the Senator from Illinois; and the case being altered, perhaps it alters the case. [Laughter.]

If I am to be permitted to proceed immediately subject to a motion to go into executive session, I will go on, but to that I will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska yielded the floor for the purpose of having the President's message read.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make a suggestion? The Senator having yielded for that purpose, suppose we have the President's message read, and then the Senator can determine as well as he can now whether he will afterward yield to the Senator from Illinois or not. I think the message ought to be read, and I understand the Senator to have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be read.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask him to yield to me at all. I thought he had yielded the floor, and I was going to have a dispatch read.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Secretary read the following message:

To the Senate of the United States:

Senate bill No. 1044, "to provide for the resumption of specie payments," is before me, and this day receives my signature of approval. I venture upon this unusual method of conveying the notice of approval to the House in which the measure orginated because of its great importance to the country at large and in order to suggest further legislation, which seems to me essential to make this law effective.

It is a subject of congratulation that a measure has become law which fixes a date when specie resumption shall commence, and implies an obligation on the part of Congress, if in its power, to give such legislation as may prove necessary to redeem this promise. To this end I respectfully call your attention to a few suggestions.

First. The necessity of an increased revenue to carry out the obligation of adding to the sinking fund annually 1 per cent. of the public debt, amounting now to about $34,000,000 per annum, and to carry out the promises of this measure to redeem, under certain contingencies, eighty millions of the present legal-tenders, and without contingency the fractional currency now in circulation. How to increase the surplus revenue is for Congress to devise; but I will venture to suggest that the duty on tea and coffee might be restored without permanently enhancing the cost to the consumers, and that the 10 per cent. horizontal reduction of the tariff on articles specified in the law of June 6, 1872, be repealed. The supply of tea and coffee already on hand in the United States would in all probability be advanced in price by adopting this measure. But it is known that the adoption of free entry to those articles of necessity did not cheapen them, but merely added to the profits of the countries producing them, or of the middlemen in those countries who have the exclusive trade in them.

Second. The first section of the bill now under consideration provides that the fractional currency shall be redeemed in silver coin as rapidly as practicable. There is no provision preventing the fluctuation in the value of the paper currency. With gold at a premium of anything over 10 per cent. above the currency in use, it is probable—almost certain—that silver would be bought up for exportation as fast as it was put out, or until change would become so scarce as to make the premium on it equal to the premium on gold, or sufficiently high to make it no longer profitable to buy for export, thereby causing a direct loss to the community at large and great embarrassment to trade. As the present law commands final resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879, and as the gold receipts by the Treasury are larger than the gold payments, and the currency receipts smaller than the currency payments, thereby making monthly sales of gold necessary to meet current currency expenses, it occurs to me that these difficulties might be remedied by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes, whenever presented, in sums of not less than $100 and multiples thereof, at a premium for gold of 10 per cent., less interest at the rate of 2⅔ per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1875, to the date of putting this law into operation, and diminishing this premium at the same rate until final resumption, changing the rate of premium demanded from time to time as the interest amounts to ¼ of 1 per cent. I suggest this rate of interest because it would bring currency at par with gold at the date fixed by law for final resumption. I suggest 10 per cent. as the demand premium at the beginning, because I believe this rate would insure the retention of silver in the country for change.

The provisions of the third section of the act will prevent combinations being made to exhaust the Treasury of coin. With such a law it is presumable that no gold would be called for not required for legitimate business purposes. When large amounts of coin should be drawn from the Treasury, correspondingly large amounts of currency would be withdrawn from circulation, thus causing a sufficient stringency in currency to stop the outward flow of coin.

The advantages of a currency of a fixed, known value would also be reached. In my opinion, by the enactment of such law, business and industries would revive, and the beginning of prosperity on a firm basis would be reached.

Other means of increasing revenue than those suggested should probably be devised, and also other legislation. In fact, to carry out the first section of the act another mint becomes a necessity. With the present facilities for coinage, it would take a period probably beyond that fixed by law for final specie resumption to coin the silver necessary to transact the business of the country.

There are now smelting furnaces for extracting the silver and gold from the ores brought from the mountain Territories, in Chicago, Saint Louis, and Omaha—three in the former city; and as much of the change required will be wanted in the Mississippi Valley States, and as the metals to be coined come from west of those States, and, as I understand, the charges for transportation of bullion from either of the cities named to the Mint in Philadelphia or to New York City amount to four dollars for each one thousand dollars' worth, with an equal expense for transportation back, it would seem a fair argument in favor of adopting one or more of those cities as the place or places for the establishment of new coining facilities.

I have ventured upon this subject with great diffidence, because it is so unusual to approve a measure—as I most heartily do this, even if no further legislation is attainable at this time—and to announce the fact by message. But I do so, because I feel that it is a subject of such vital importance to the whole country, that it should receive the attention of and be discussed by Congress and the people, through the press and in every way, to the end that the best and most satisfactory course may be reached of executing what I deem most beneficial legislation on a most vital question to the interests and prosperity of the nation.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 14, 1875.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the message was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4321) removing the political disabilities of John Withers, Joseph F. Winter, and William Kearney was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a telegram, dated the 11th instant, from the commanding-general Military Division of the Pacific, relative to a decision of the United States district justice at Portland, Oregon, as to the time of retention of prisoners by the military under section 23 of the act of June 30, 1834; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 14, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the regular order for a moment to allow me to ask the House to concur in a verbal amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 3 of the bill strike out "passed" and insert "approved."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT FUND OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice, presented a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a detailed statement of all the expenditures of the contingent fund of his Department since January 1, 1874, to January 1, 1875, and moved that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice.

Mr. RANDALL. Why should it go to that committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. It comes from them.

Mr. RANDALL. So it is printed, I suppose there is no harm in making that reference.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT OF 1874.

Mr. LAMPORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print two hundred and fifty-five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1874; fifty thousand copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, one hundred and eighty thousand copies for the use of the House of Represenatives, and twenty-five thousand copies for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before I insist on the call for the regular order, perhaps in justice to a large number of claimants the document that was stayed yesterday at my suggestion should be laid before the House and referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 16, 1874, a schedule of claims under the act of July 4, 1864, examined and allowed since June 30, 1874.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to state in connection with this communication that the second section of the Army appropriation bill of last session took away from the accounting officers of the Treasury the power to pay claims that they passed on, but authorized them to go on and examine them; and required the Secretary of the Treasury to report at the commencement of each session of Congress the number and names of such claims as might have been favorably acted on. I ask that the list be printed, and that it be referred with the accompanying testimony to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the list will be printed, and will be referred with the testimony, which will not be printed, to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4321) removing the political disabilities of John Withers, Joseph F. Minter, and William Kearney; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there a petition accompanying the bill?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir; there is a petition in each case.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting therefor.

PAPERS IN QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the disposition of papers in the Quartermaster-General's Office which are of no further use; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HORACE GLOVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the claim of Horace Glover for proceeds of certain goods seized and sold by George J. Stannard, late collector of customs for the district of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BREAKWATER AT CLEVELAND HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 23, 1874, a report with estimates of the cost of a breakwater at the harbor of Cleveland, Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NEW JAIL IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriations required for the completion of a new jail in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FOND DU LAC INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a proposed bill to provide for the sale of a portion of the Fond Du Lac Indian reservation in Minnesota, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN SERVICE IN COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of the appropriation required for the Indian service in Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CAPITOL BUILDING AT OLYMPIA, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an estimate of appropriations required for certain repairs to the territorial capitol building at Olympia, Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AGENT SPERRY AND W. COURTENAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill providing for payment of a loss of private property belonging to Agent Sperry and W. Courtenay, Fort Berthold Agency; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

FORCE IN THE FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ twenty folders, including book-keepers and others, for the purpose of folding the Agricultural Report for the year 1873, and other public documents, from January 1, to March 4, 1875.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It would of course be the regular order of business if the House should vote in favor of the motion. If the House should not sustain that motion, then the call of committees would be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that we shall expedite public business by avoiding the morning hour to-day.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think not; I think it would expedite public business if we have a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to decide.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE; and on a division there were—ayes 61, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POLAND in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

One for the tribes in Iowa, namely, at the Sac and Fox of Iowa agency, $500: Provided, That no salary shall be paid to the agent unless he lives near enough to the agency to teach and care for the tribe every day; and no incidental expenses shall be allowed for this agency, and no employés.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to strike out the last two lines, being the words "and no incidental expenses shall be allowed for this agency, and no employés."

Mr. RANDALL. I think that is a very valuable limitation. I hope the gentleman will give some reason why the committee now propose to strike it out; some reason which they did not have when they inserted it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The reason is that we desire to have a teacher employed at this agency, and I propose to offer an amendment which will cover that point if the gentleman will wait.

Mr. RANDALL. But do not let us strike out the entire limitation.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and it was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move now to add at the close of the paragraph as it stands the following:

And $1,000 is hereby appropriated for the support of a school at said agency.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman that we should not strike out anything but add that. The limitation contained in that clause is a valuable one, because it prevents undue expenditures of money.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to that. I ask unanimous consent that the words stricken out be restored and that the amendment I have moved be added to the paragraph.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seven for the tribes in Arizona, namely, Colorado River, Papago, Pima, and Maricopa, Chiricahui, San Carlos, Camp Apache, and Moquis Pueblo agencies, in all $102,500: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the President to dispense with the services of such Indian agents herein mentioned as may be practicable, and where it is practicable he shall require the same person to perform the duties of two agencies for one salary.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out the last word of that proviso; and I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Iowa a question. This proviso says that "it shall be the duty of the President to dispense with the services of such Indian agents herein mentioned as may be practicable, and where it is practicable he shall require the same person to perform the duties of two agencies for one salary." We have made a provision of that sort several times before, and we made others of like character, giving the President discretion in certain contingencies to change the distribution of the money as made by us. We did it in the last Indian appropriation bill, and it is in reference to that I desire to ask a question. We did it not only in the last Indian appropriation bill, but I think in the one before; surely in the last. I hold in my hand the last bill, a section of which provides that "the several appropriations here made for teachers, millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulations, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of various Indian tribes, within the discretion of the President and with the consent of said tribes, expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress at the next session thereafter of his action under this provision."

What I desire to know is whether any report has ever been made under any provision of law on that or any kindred subject. The same provision is contained in the bill now before the House, and I would like to know if any reports have not been made by the President or under his direction, as required by law; and if not, why not?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I know of no report having been made, but I have not inquired about it. There may be such a report on our files. The gentleman can ascertain that by inquiring at the document-room, I presume.

Mr. BECK. I suggest that if any report had been made the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of the subject, should have known it and have modified this bill accordingly; but although the law requires that such a report shall be made, it appears that the Committee on Appropriations know nothing about it. The presumption therefore is that none has been made.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that no report has been made?

Mr. BECK. I understood the gentleman to say that he knew of none.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have not inquired for it.

Mr. BECK. I presume that none has been made, as that committee are ignorant upon that subject. I have not heard of any.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I presume the President made the report which the law required him to make.

Mr. BECK. I supposed the committee who had charge of this matter would know if such a report had been made, if anybody knew it. I assume, therefore, that none has been made, and therefore quit that. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another fact. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his classification of the Indians for whom we are making these appropriations, classifies them thus:

For convenience of reference and remark, the Indians of the country may be classified under three heads:

First. Those that are wild and scarcely tractable to any extent beyond that of coming near enough to the Government agent to receive rations and blankets.

Second. Indians who are thoroughly convinced of the necessity of labor, and are actually undertaking it, and with more or less readiness accept the direction and assistance of Government agents to this end.

Third. Indians who have come into possession of allotted lands and other property in stock and implements belonging to a landed estate.

In regard to class one the Commissioner proceeds to say:

In the first class are enumerated 98,108, who may be catalogued as follows: 46,663 out of about 53,000 Sioux; 420 Mandans; 1,620 Gros Ventres; 4,200 Crows; 5,450 Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans; 6,153 Utes in Colorado and New Mexico; 9,057 Apaches in New Mexico and Arizona; 2,000 Navajoes in New Mexico; 4,975 Kiowas and Comanches in Indian Territory; 6,818 Cheyennes and Arapahoes in Indian Territory, Wyoming, and Dakota; 5,352 Chippewas in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan; 300 Nez Percés in Idaho; 1,600 Shoshones and Bannacks in Wyoming; 1,000 Shoshones and Bannacks in Oregon.

Now, remember (of those 98,000 Indians) the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says they are only reached by their coming near enough to the agencies to receive blankets and provisions. And yet in the very bill before the House are items of appropriation referring to and pretending to carry out (so called) treaty stipulations and provisions, giving these wild Indians large sums of money for blacksmiths, millers, carpenters, engineers, school-teachers, and all sorts of employés, not one of whom can do or attempt to do any service for the Indians, because, as the Commissioner says, these Indians come only near enough to the agencies to receive rations and blankets. Therefore it must be obvious to every member that all the money appropriated under these so-called treaty provisions cannot be used in the way in which the House supposes it is being used; and if it is spent at all, it is wrongfully spent.

It was to guard against that evil that there was a provision inserted in the last Indian appropriation bill, and I believe in the bill of the year before, authorizing the money to be diverted to other uses and directing reports to be made to Congress of those uses, which it seems has not been done, or if it has the men who ought to know do not.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that Congress, or the President, or the Secretary of the Interior, or anybody else has the right to divert that fund, when it is provided expressly by terms in treaties that it shall be applied in a particular way, unless it is done by consent of the Indians?

Mr. BECK. I will say——

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Wait a moment, until I get through. I agree with the gentleman perfectly that in many cases it is much better that this fund should be employed in another way than that stipulated by the treaties, provided you can get the consent of the Indians. But if they do not consent to it, the consequence is that if we divert the money without their consent, in after years they will come up here and claim that we have violated our treaties with them, and they will make us responsible for that amount of money and call upon us to repay it. Now I ask the gentleman if it is proper to violate our treaty stipulations, or to expend the money in a way otherwise than the treaty stipulates, except with the consent of the Indians?

Mr. BECK. My answer to that is twofold. I do not want to go over the whole treaty question any more. I have done that at least once before, perhaps oftener. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] announced yesterday, and I want to premise my answer to his question, that he heard me make four years ago the same speech that I made yesterday. Now, Mr. Chairman, my speech of yesterday was made about an event that occurred only last October, and I had been told about it by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] only five minutes before I spoke. How I could have made that same speech four years ago I cannot imagine.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It was only a revised edition of the gentleman's speech of four years ago, with that added.

Mr. BECK. Well, if the House can understand how I could make a speech four years ago about a thing that occurred only last October, and of which I had been informed only five minutes before, then the gentleman's statement may be correct. But I want to answer the main question of the gentleman. He asks what are we to do except to appropriate according to the treaty stipulations. In the first place I want to say again that these so-called treaties are not treaties in any proper sense; they never were treaties. The commissioners went out there under an act of Congress; and that act of Congress required that they should submit their action to Congress for its approval. It never was submitted to Congress for its approval. And so palpably were their acts regarded as no treaties, that in 1870 or 1871 the House refused absolutely to make any appropriations to carry them out, and Congress put two million or perhaps three million dollars into the hands of the President to enable him to carry on the Indian affairs regardless of all those treaties. And he did carry them on during that fiscal year with the sum so given him, and the Indians were better provided for, when the military had control of the matter in 1871, with two or three million dollars thus given in a lump to the President, than they have been since with all the machinery provided by these so-called treaties at a cost of $7,000,000 expenditures every year.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BECK. I have not got through yet with the question of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER.] Suppose it is provided by treaty stipulations that the Indians shall have the service of millers, mechanics, farmers, teachers, and everything else of that kind; and we have the official declaration of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that these Indians, with whom we have made all these so-called treaty arrangements, are so wild that they only approach the agencies near enough to obtain rations and blankets. So, not one dollar of all the moneys we have been appropriating for them, which has amounted to millions during the last seven years, for the purpose of employing mechanics, farmers, engineers, and school-masters, has ever been spent for that purpose. And those men if they have been employed have done nothing but absorb the money of the Government, without rendering the services for which that money purported to be appropriated. Are we still to go on and repeat this folly and wasteful expenditure year by year? With the admitted facts now before us we certainly ought to withhold it and apply it to the Indians, if necessary for their support, in some other form. We certainly ought not to go through the farce of keeping a host of Government employés, whether called engineers, teachers, millers, or anything else, that the wild Indians never see and would scalp if they did. We should at least put our appropriations in some form that will be available. Therefore it was that we passed the provision of law which we did a year ago, and I want to see the report required by it. According to what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says, not one dollar of this money has ever been expended among these wild tribes in the way which we intended. I will now hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Instead of making these general denunciations, I would like to have the gentleman point out what tribe among these has not had schools while money has been appropriated for their education.

Mr. BECK. I refer the gentleman to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. On the first page of that report the Commissioner, classifying the Indians, says that the first class are "those that are wild and scarcely tractable to any extent beyond that of coming near enough to the Government agent to receive rations and blankets." He says further that this first class numbers 98,108. In the enumeration which he gives you will find named several tribes with which we have what are called treaties; among them are the Sioux, the Crows, the Apaches, the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and others. In this bill now before us are contained provisions for carrying out in detail treaty stipulations with these wild tribes—although the Commissioner himself say that none of these Indians can be reached by such machinery; that they only come to the agencies to receive their blankets and supplies. I say that wherever any tribe provided for in the bill is found enumerated in this first class by the Commissioner, the money ought to be otherwise used.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the gentleman whether it is not otherwise used?

Mr. BECK. I have already stated that we had made a provision in the former law that it might be; and we required a report to be made at each session. The gentleman says he does not know that it has ever been done. I do not think it ever has. If the money has been otherwise used I want to know it. If it can be used for any good purpose, I am willing to vote it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Will the gentleman point out any tribe to which his remarks are applicable? Here are fifteen tribes.

Mr. BECK. I point out the Crows, the Apaches, and two or three branches of the Sioux tribes, besides several others. The gentleman can see them in the bill. When we reach them in the bill I will point them out.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment for the purpose of correcting a mistake into which I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has fallen. He takes the position that certain treaties made with some of these northwestern Indians are not treaties at all, because, as he claims, under the law of July 20, 1867, the commissioners appointed to make those treaties were required to report their action to Congress for our approval; that they never did so report their action, and that Congress, as made up of the Senate and the House, has never approved that action; that therefore these cannot be regarded as valid treaties. Upon this point I think the gentleman has fallen into an error. If he will but look at the language of the first section of the act, he will, I think, see the error himself. The first section provides:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission, to consist of three officers of the Army and three civilians. They shall have power and authority to call together the chiefs and head-men of such bands or tribes of Indians as are now waging war against the United States or committing depredations upon the people thereof, to ascertain the alleged reasons for their acts of hostility, and in their discretion, under the direction of the President, to make and conclude with said bands or tribes such treaty stipulations, subject to the action of the Senate, as may remove all just causes of complaint on their part, and at the same time establish security for persons and property along the lines of railroad now being constructed to the Pacific, &c.

Thus the commissioners were required by the first section of the act to make such treaty stipulations as they in their discretion might deem proper, and to report these treaty stipulations to the Senate for approval. This is just what they did. The second section of the act contains a provision directing these commissioners to mark out the section of country upon which these Indians shall be located. This involved the question of the disposition, at least temporarily, of a portion of the soil of the United States, and the action of the commissioners in that particular was required to be reported to Congress. But treaty stipulations that were to be made, apart from defining and fixing the boundaries of the reservations of these Indians, were required by the first section of this act to be reported to the Senate of the United States for its approval. These commissioners did make their report to the Senate, and the Senate did approve this treaty. I hold that this treaty with the Sioux and the other treaties made by this commission, consisting of General Sherman and other military officers, ex-Senator Henderson and the other civilians, (which treaties were reported under this law and approved by the Senate,) are just as binding upon this Government as any law of Congress, because a treaty in its binding force upon the people of the United States occupies an equal relation with a law of Congress.

The gentleman from Kentucky certainly falls into error in regarding the powers of this commission as defined solely by the second section, when their powers are much larger as defined by the first section. The gentleman certainly falls into another error when he declares that it would be better to appropriate this money in a lump and have it disbursed to these Indians, without having the particular method of its disbursement specified by treaty obligation. I beg leave to differ from the gentleman on that point. I believe that if we should appropriate this whole amount in a lump without defining the mode of its application, you might have just grounds to complain of frauds in the Indian service. I am very glad to see that my friend from Kentucky, unlike his political colleagues and friends generally in the House and the Senate, has not lost confidence in the Army. He believes in its honesty and integrity. I agree with him in that particular. Yet I think it is better and more successful upon the part of the Government to manage Indian affairs as a peace matter than to manage them by the military.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few remarks in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri. The committee will observe that whatever arrangements have been made with these tribes of Indians in 1867 were made in pursuance of an act of Congress, and not under the treaty-making power. The President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of course, has the right to make treaties, but it was not assumed these Indians occupied such relation toward this Government, at this time at least, whatever it may have been in years gone by, as would authorize treaties to be made with them under the treaty-making power. Therefore an act of Congress was passed, and while the first section of that act, as has been well said, authorized them to make arrangements about money, still a further provision was made that wherever reservations were established, wherever rights of territory were given, report should be made to Congress for its approval. That brought the whole matter before Congress. The commissioners appointed under the act located and established reservations and placed Indians on them, upon which all this money is being spent and where these Indian agencies have been provided for without submitting the question to Congress for approval as provided for in the law. The primary object of the commission was the establishment of these reservations; but under the law there could be no allotting of reservations, and consequently no expenditure of money under any arrangement made for reservations until the approval of Congress had been obtained; and because they never did report to Congress we have steadily refused to recognize them as valid treaties, and as I have already said preferred some years ago to place money in the hands of the President in bulk rather than recognize them. The next session after we did that, after three conference committees had met, we finally agreed, rather than have an extra session of Congress, that we would make the appropriations asked for under, as they were then termed, the so-called treaties. There was also added, and it will be found upon the statute-book, the additional provision that there should be no further treaties attempted to be made with Indians; and the Senate agreed to that provision, and gave up any pretenses hereafter to the right to make such treaties. So I was right, Mr. Chairman, in saying that the action of that commission had to come before Congress, because the very territory set apart as reservations had in the first place to be approved of by Congress before any other part of their action could be valid. But I repeat they never did make report to Congress, and their action never was approved. Their action was a blunder and a nullity, although by one section they did have the right to dispose of money if the other essential things were approved by Congress. So much for that point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say further that the reports of the Government officers, of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, all prove what I said yesterday, and what I now repeat, that nearly all the money so appropriated for these Indians is squandered and gone. As to all such payments the Secretary of the Interior reports the facts to be—I give his language—

In many instances we have treaty stipulations requiring annuities of cash and property to be paid to Indians per capita.

This is the report which came to us from the Secretary of the Interior only the other day, and I wish gentlemen to listen to it—

In some cases the only evidence of such payments consists of receipts given by the chiefs of the tribes.

Just think of it! Receipts given by wild Indian chiefs, who do not know the value of a dollar and who only come in for blankets!

The only receipts these men can get is from those who call themselves chiefs of tribes.

The improvidence and want of intelligence which characterize most Indians entitled to such annuities render these payments not merely useless, but absolutely unprofitable.

That is not my language. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is here, he will perhaps now see that I was right in saying that at least 75 per cent. of Indian annuity money has been squandered. The Secretary tells us that these payments are not merely useless, but unprofitable; nay, even demoralizing.

The improvidence and want of intelligence which characterize most Indians entitled to such annuities, render these payments not merely useless, but absolutely unprofitable; nay, even demoralizing. On receipt of the money or goods, the uncivilized Indian hastens to dispose of his portion for a toy, a trifle, or, what may be worse, spirituous liquors, which render him troublesome and dangerous. In view of these and other examples which could be given, early legislation to remedy such defects in the existing laws is absolutely necessary, and the attention of Congress is seriously and earnestly invited to the consideration of this subject.

That is the language of the Secretary of the Interior himself. He tells us that all these payments are often spent for toys and trifles and drinks of liquor. Here is where the evil is to which I referred yesterday, giving to President Grant's brother or any other gentleman the exclusive right to trade with them, and thus get back all the money paid in the way of annuities under treaties from Indian chiefs in exchange for "toys, trifles, and glasses of liquor."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BECK. Allow me one word further. Trade with the Indians should be open to all men, so there could be competition and surveillance of one over the other. There should be some watch or guard over these Indians in the disbursement of the annuities which they receive from the Government.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I will renew it, for I have not yet completed what I wish to say.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I thought the gentleman was done.

Mr. BECK. I do not have any other purpose in making these statements than to save money and have it properly used for the purposes for which it is appropriated. The Secretary of the Interior, as I have shown, tells us that of all the annuities paid to these ninety-eight thousand men, a large portion is not only useless but absolutely unprofitable, nay demoralizing, as the money which is given to them is disposed of for "toys, trifles, and, what is worse, spirituous liquors," making them dangerous and troublesome. It is bad policy—certainly contrary to a wise public policy—to place the exclusive right of trading with these Indians in the hands of any one man, thus enabling him to get back the money paid by us as annuities for toys, trifles, and spirituous liquors. The Secretary says, I repeat, that there are ninety-eight thousand of these men, and the House can readily see how the money appropriated to them in the way of annuities is squandered by giving the exclusive right to one man to trade with them, taking their money in exchange for "toys, trifles, and glasses of liquor." There ought at least to be competition and surveillance over these men. There ought to be some means provided by which these traders shall be watched and the Indians and Government protected. A word in reference to what was said yesterday by the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.] I find he stated that I denounced all these Indian agents as thieves. Now, sir, I never said any such thing.

I do not believe with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] that Indian agents are as good, as honest, as faithful as any class of employés of the Government. If they are, God help the Government; for the testimony often furnished to the House all goes to prove that those Indians, many of them, are so absolutely under the control of interested men, agents, traders, and others that they are at their mercy, and have to do just what they demand. The Delegate from Montana, Mr. Cavanaugh, when here two or three years ago, showed that an Indian agent in his Territory had been dismissed because he refused to sign a fraudulent receipt for about $50,000, when the true amount was less than $7,000.

What I want to get at is, that if we are to pay money, let it be paid for the use and benefit of those for whom we appropriate it. One word more. The reference made to my faith in the Army amounts to this: I have said on this floor, and I say again, that the Army of the United States has to meet those Indians whenever trouble occurs. They have to take the field and take all the risks. They stir up no strife, because there is no glory in fighting a wild Indian. They might kill them all and have no glory attaching to them for what they did. Therefore, they are careful in their dealings with the Indians not to provoke them to strife, while the agents and the traders who are beyond the jurisdiction of the Army, and outside of their control, and who cannot be arrested by them, or even stopped in their mischief, stir up the strife, and the soldiers have to fight it out, and cannot prevent it.

I have said furthermore, and I repeat, that the officers of the Army of the United States have been in all the past, and I hope will always continue to be, honest men, who faithfully account for all money put into their hands, and that they can be tried by court-martial if they do not. They have an esprit de corps, and a pride in the character of the Army, which makes them honest. And I said last session and repeat now that the Engineer Corps of the Army during the almost one hundred years it has been in existence has not been found in default for one dollar, and I am proud to say it.

Therefore I have contended and shall continue to contend that the Army in this regard is the safest depositary of the public money, and I further desire a thorough investigation of these matters. While I was in favor of the peace policy at first, I believe in the way in which it has been carried out it has been a failure. All the wholesome restraints have been withdrawn from it. The Army ought to have control of the business. It is the only way you can have it done, and at the same time do justice; and when the Indians fail to recognize and submit to justice, then punish them with absolute severity. England has maintained her power over the Indians in Canada by carrying out that policy, and we could do the same thing. It is because we have divided councils, operating against each other, and because the Army has not the power to do what the British army does, that nine-tenths of all our troubles with the Indians arise.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHANKS. I had not intended to take part in this discussion; but when I hear it said on this floor that the peace policy is a failure, I cannot retain my seat any longer. I ask what has the war policy done for the Indians? It has almost annihilated a race, and left but some fragments to be gathered together by the friends of peace to be taken care of at this time. And what, sir, was the condition of the Indian question when this peace policy was inaugurated a short time ago? You had upon your statute-books treaties that were giving the lands of these Indians away to railroad companies.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to say one word?

Mr. SHANKS. I have little time to spare.

Mr. BECK. I did not catch distinctly what the gentleman said; but if he thinks I want the Indians turned over to the Army to destroy the peace policy, he is mistaken. I think the true peace policy is to put them under the charge of men whose interest it is to keep peace. That is my desire.

Mr. SHANKS. The gentleman said the peace policy was a failure. That means that the war policy must be the next thing.

Mr. BECK. O, no, no!

Mr. SHANKS. Then the peace policy is not a failure, and the war policy would be. Then the gentleman's speech amounts to nothing, because he contradicts himself.

But what was the condition of the Indian when the present Administration came into power? It must be known to every man in this House that treaties were being made under the administration of Andrew Johnson that were passing all the lands of the Indians to railroad companies. This was being done by virtue of treaties made with Indian tribes and confirmed by the Senate of the United States. When this Administration came into power there were five treaties pending that were conveying almost the entire Indian lands in Kansas to railroad companies. Those treaties were called back by the President from the Senate, having been sent there by the former President, and all that large tract of country was saved from the grasp of those companies and turned over to settlement. Prior to the time the peace policy was adopted, the Cherokees of North Carolina had been plundered, by their own agent, of their money and two hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, which had been transferred into the name of the agent. Under the peace policy a suit was brought, and the money and lands recovered.

I say to this House, to-day, that there has been more honest effort, more action for the benefit of the Indians since General Grant came into power six years ago, than had been manifested on behalf of the Indians since the Government was organized and since the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock.

Sir, no man can look at the action of the Government and gainsay this statement for a moment. I say, sir, that during the administration of General Grant there have been more efforts made to save this people than had been done since they were first discovered by Columbus. As an evidence of this there is now an increase of population among the Indians. You cannot find that prior to six years ago in any part of the country. I know, sir, there is a prejudice against the Indians. I know it is a popular thing to attack them and to say that a dead Indian is the best Indian, but for one I am not prepared to take that position. I repeat, sir, with emphasis, that there have been more efforts made to save the Indians during the last six years than at any time in the past.

Now, sir, the peace policy does not include the taking care of the Indian who does not behave himself. If Indians misbehave themselves under the peace policy you turn against them the Army of the United States and punish them and compel them to keep order. It is not its object or intent to protect the bad Indian, but it is to save the Indians generally.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor one or two things have forced themselves on my mind in reference to this Indian question, either that our Indian policy is wrong, or that the money we appropriate is in some way or other dishonestly or otherwise expended. I believe it is an admitted fact that the Indians of the United States are decreasing every year, and notwithstanding this decrease in the number of Indians who are to be fed, clothed, and protected by the Government, yet year by year we are increasing, and increasing at an enormous rate, the expenses of taking care of them and protecting them. I find, sir, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on page 14 that in the year 1860 there was appropriated for the Indian service $2,991,121.54; in 1861, $2,865,481.17; in 1862, $2,327,948.37; in 1863, $3,152,032.70; and in 1864, $2,629,975.97.

Now let us take the five years commencing with 1870. During that period the appropriations were in 1870, $3,407,938.12; in 1871, $7,426,997.44; in 1872, $7,061,728.82; 1873, $7,951,704.88; and in 1874, $6,692,462.69.

Now, sir, in view of these figures, I ask the House, I ask the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, if it is not high time that we as the guardians of the Treasury of the United States should inquire into the Indian policy of the Government? In 1863 it cost less than $3,000,000 to clothe, feed, and protect the Indians; to-day it costs $7,000,000, although the number of the Indians to be cared for has largely decreased. There must be some answer to this question by the committee, and it is high time, in my judgment, that we should either change our policy entirely, or that the money we appropriate for the Indian service should be more honestly expended. I have never yet had a sufficient answer given to me by the members of the Committee on Appropriations, who have charge of this bill, why it is that when the Indians are decreasing in numbers year by year it costs more to care for them now than it did in the year 1860. In 1860 it cost less than $3,000,000, and to-day it costs $7,000,000, to take care of a less number of Indians. It is like the Sybilline leaves; the fewer there are the more they cost.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. In 1838, I believe, we had a democratic administration.

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That was a good while ago, and at that time the Indians had the whole West to roam over and to hunt over, and they did not have to be supported by the Government to the same extent that they do now. It cost then $5,500,000 under a democratic administration to take care of them, and it costs now less than $5,000,000, when they are no longer able to roam and hunt. We are now feeding one hundred thousand Indians, and this bill calls for less than $5,000,000. Will the gentleman explain the difference? Will he explain why it is that under a democratic administration, when the Indians had the whole country to roam over, it cost more to support them than it does now?

Mr. HEREFORD. If my memory serves me right, at that time there were treaties pending for the removal of the Indians to other locations, which involved, of course, a large increase of expenditure. This was the year when we were removing large bodies of Indians from Alabama and Mississippi and paying in part for their lands. Another reason is that at that time we had no railroad lines passing through the Indian country, and I remember that that was one of the arguments used in favor of the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad and in favor of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad, that it would cost less to transport provisions and other supplies to the Indians if these roads were constructed than it did under the old system. Yet, notwithstanding these increased facilities of transportation and the decrease of the number of Indians, our expenditures have run up from $3,000,000 to $7,000,000.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEREFORD. In one moment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] has called my attention to the expenses for Indian purposes in 1838. I ask him what were the expenses in the next year, 1839? As soon as these Indians had been removed the appropriations for that purpose were reduced to a fraction over $2,000,000; the next year they were $2,000,000; the next year $2,000,000; and the next $1,000,000. And in 1843 the appropriations ran down to $578,000. But we are now on the upward turn; the appropriations are going on increasing until we have now reached $7,000,000 a year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For pay of three Indian inspectors, at $3,000 each, $9,000: Provided, That after the commencement of the next fiscal year there shall be but three inspectors; and the provision of law requiring that each agency shall be visited and examined by one or more of the inspectors at least twice in each year is hereby repealed.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. For one I am very much in favor of the reduction proposed by the Committee on Appropriations in the number of inspectors from five to three. But after a careful examination of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs I fail to see that these officers have been of any substantial use whatever. But this proviso seeks to repeal that part of the duty which was evidently in view when they were provided, to wit, that they should travel over the country and visit and examine these various agencies. I hope, therefore, that the entire paragraph will be stricken out. That of course will involve the necessity of striking out the succeeding paragraph, which is as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses of three Indian inspectors, $6,000.

By that means $15,000 can be saved. My information leads me to believe that while the committee have done very right in reducing the number of inspectors, they might have cut deeper and abolished them entirely.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. This reduction was made upon consultation with the Department, and because they thought they could get on with three inspectors.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the reduction is right; but you do not go quite far enough.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. They do need three inspectors. There should be inspectors to go around and examine these agencies. We have heard a great deal from gentlemen on the other side of the House about dishonest agents; and I think it will do no harm to watch them if we have so many agents who are dishonest.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon the principle of setting a rogue to watch a rogue.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think that is rather forced.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we could save $15,000 and do no harm whatever.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The Department disagrees with the gentleman there.

Mr. RANDALL. I am very sorry the Department does, and I am still more sorry that the gentleman does.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think we had better compromise and reduce the number to three. I do not think we can do without these inspectors.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Permit me to suggest one point. It is sometimes complained that where these inspectors have a certain district set apart for them, the agents know just when they are coming and are prepared to receive them. It is now proposed by the Department that the agents shall not know when these inspectors go around. The Department proposes to adopt the same system that the Treasury Department has adopted in reference to revenue agents. I understand the Treasury Department sends out a revenue agent when it sees proper, and he goes quietly to the revenue collectors without their knowing when he is to come. That has worked beneficially in the Treasury Department, and the object is to adopt the same rule in the Interior Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I was led to make the remarks I have mainly because I failed to see in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs any account of duties performed by any of these inspectors, although I believe they are good men. There is one of them I know to be a good man; I believe his name to be Mr. Kemble, a most excellent citizen and a good officer. I will not press my amendment, but will withdraw it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I renew the amendment. I can speak for one of the inspectors, Mr. Vandivier. I know him to be a good, honest man; I know he has devoted the entire year to this service, and he is now preparing his report. I was deputized by him to visit a reservation as an inspector, and I am preparing my report. I understand that he will submit his report as soon as I have completed mine and submitted it to him. I know he has acted in good faith.

At the same time I know that frauds have been perpetrated on these reservations; frauds of the most damnable character. I know, too, that Mr. Vandivier has and will cut off the official heads of the persons committing those frauds whenever he can get the opportunity. I know that in my district frauds have been perpetrated, and I came here last year for the purpose of asking an investigation. I went to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I found him to be a good, honest man, and willing to do what he could in the premises. Consequently I have submitted all my complaints to him, and the agents were removed.

Before this bill is concluded I propose to submit an amendment, to let these reservations to citizens who will feed, clothe, and educate these Indians. We are now paying out thousands of dollars annually in my district, much of which is virtually stolen from the Government. Many of the Indians have good land, are good farmers, and capable of taking care of themselves, if you will just remove those men who, acting as agents, are destitute of all business qualifications, and in many instances are dishonest, and place good men in their stead.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] whether, when acting as deputy inspector, as he says he did, he did not trace out these frauds and report them?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have traced out some of them, and I will soon have my report before the Department. Furthermore, I will say that Commissioner Smith will remove every man connected with any peculation. So far as my district is concerned, he is acting in good faith; and I ask members of Congress, whether democrats or republicans, to lay their complaints before the Commissioner, and he will do all within his power to prevent frauds and peculation.

Mr. RANDALL. To what Smith does the gentleman refer?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Commissioner Smith.

Mr. RANDALL. What are his initials?

Mr. LUTTRELL. E. P. Smith. He is acting in good faith. In my district he has removed one agent for peculation or mismanagement; and the official heads of others will soon fall, I hope.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I am very glad indeed to hear so open and candid an opinion from a gentleman belonging to the other side of the House with regard to the honesty of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I fully indorse all the gentleman has said.

Mr. LUTTRELL. One word more. As I already said, I came here to enter complaints and ask for an investigation by Congress; but since I found Commissioner Smith willing to help me without going to Congress for an investigation, I have co-operated with him; and in my district he has assented to everything which I have requested of him. He has acted the part of a true, honest, and faithful official.

I went to the Postmaster-General at the last session upon another matter and made complaints; but he did not seem to manifest the interest in the question that I thought it demanded. I then asked an investigation by the House into what was known as "straw-bidding;" but that investigation was refused. We have now, however, at the head of the Post-Office Department a man who, like Commissioner Smith, is ready to inquire into all these frauds and punish the guilty. I believe that if members of Congress will go to the heads of Departments and make their complaints, in many instances those officers will remedy the evil. That is what I propose to do; and when any Department refuses to listen to my complaints, I will then submit my charges to the action of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Some of us have been doing that for a great many years; but we have not found the result at all satisfactory.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then I say do as I did in regard to the postal ring; make your fight against whoever stands in the way. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies of the Indian service, including traveling, incidental, current, and contingent expenses of superintendents and agents, and of their offices, $35,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "five," so as to make the appropriation $30,000 instead of $35,000. I have myself a good deal of horror of these contingent funds. I think the sooner we commence to curtail them the better. Certainly we should not increase them. But here is an increase. The appropriation last year for this item was but $30,000, while in this bill it is $35,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I thought the amount was $35,000 last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I have here the act of last year; and the item is as follows:

For contingencies, including traveling, incidental, current, and contingent expenses of superintendents and agents, and of their offices, $30,000.

The gentleman, I suppose, does not object to my amendment?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The appropriation we propose is a good deal less than the estimate.

Mr. RANDALL. The estimates are always pretty high.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no particular objection to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows, under the heading "Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches:"

For pay of carpenter, farmer, blacksmith, miller, and engineer, $5,200.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. When last on the floor I was asked by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] to point out some cases where all these appropriations in detail are not proper expenditures. It strikes me we have here, even thus early in the bill, such a case. The enumeration by the Commissioner of wild Indians who, he says, scarcely come near the Government except to receive rations, &c., includes the Kiowas and Comanches. Yet it will be observed here are these provisions in detail for carrying out a treaty. In the reports sent in last year by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, we find it stated that these Kiowas and Comanches can only be kept down by the military power of the Government; that large portions of them are at war with the United States and have been for years. It has been provided in all our Indian appropriation bills that none of the moneys appropriated shall be paid to any tribes at war with the United States. I would like to know from the gentleman managing this bill what information we have as to amounts withheld from various tribes because of their being at war. For myself I have been unable to see any. Many of these Indian tribes have been at war with us or depredating on our people. I know the Kiowas and Comanches along the Texas border have been at war very decidedly. Yet reports as to what amount of money we have been able to retain because of the belligerent attitude of these tribes I have not seen. Perhaps the gentleman from Iowa can give us the information.

One word more, and I will not trouble the House longer. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] said awhile ago that I was against the peace policy. I wish to be distinctly understood in this matter. I know the gentleman from Indiana has been the friend of the Indians. Sometimes I think he has gone too far; but I am free to say in every effort to ameliorate their condition and to obtain for them their honest dues and prevent them from being defrauded he has gone as far as any man in this House, and perhaps further. He secured, a few years ago, the passage of a provision which I had the honor to originate, for which I think he deserves the greatest credit. It was then provided as follows:

That hereafter no payments shall be made by any officer of the United States to contractors for goods or supplies of any sort furnished to the Indians, or for the transportation thereon, or for any buildings or machinery erected or placed on their reservations under or by virtue of any contract entered into with the Interior Department, or any branch thereof, on the receipts or certificates of the Indian agents or superintendents of such supplies, goods, transportation, buildings, or machinery beyond 50 per cent. of the amount due, until the accounts and vouchers shall have been submitted to the executive committee of the board of commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, and organized under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, and the third section of the act approved April 15, 1870, for examination, revisal, and approval; and it shall be the duty of said board of commissioners, without unnecessary delay, to forward said accounts and vouchers so submitted to them to the Secretary of the Interior, with the reasons for their approval or disapproval of the same, in whole or in part, attached thereto; and said Secretary shall have power to sustain, set aside, or modify the action of said board and cause payment to be made or withheld as he may determine.

That was a positive check upon frauds in the Indian Department. It was, however, repealed against my protest, and I believe against his protest, two years ago. After that check had been removed, that board of Indian commissioners reported to Congress last year that many of the payments which they had examined and tried to stop were authorized against their protest. The money was paid to the members of an Indian "ring." I do not now recollect the names of all of those who composed that Indian "ring," but I do remember the names of Dodge, Bosler, Wilder, and others of that sort. After the repeal of that check upon fraudulent contracts, it was reported that moneys had been paid clearly outside of the power of the Departments and in direct violation of law. I have always believed and still believe that all the safeguards placed upon the Indian appropriation bills in former years have been stricken out for the very purpose of allowing these frauds by the Indian "ring" to go on without the risk of exposure.

The commissioners show how these things are done.

Listen to a few words from one of the last reports of that board of Indian commissioners:

A large portion of the amount of accounts disapproved and recommended to be suspended in part, was for cattle delivered in advance of contract time and in excess of the current needs of the several agencies, which entailed upon the Government all the cost of herding, and the risk of loss by stampeding, disease, &c.

Affidavits in our possession go to show that some of the cattle lost probably got into the herds of the contractor from which they had originally come, and in one case, after receiving an amount in excess of the quantity called for by contract or needed at the time, and after the receipt had been given to the contractor for them, a large number were turned into the contractor's herds; no receipt being taken to protect the Government's interest, and no guarantee that a like number of beeves of equal weight would be delivered to the agent.

This system of excessive receipts has also caused great extravagance in issue, and, as a result at some agencies, the stock of beef calculated to last all the year is represented as all having been used before the year was more than half gone. From investigation we are satisfied issues of beef, flour, &c., have been made in some cases to a number of Indians greatly in excess of that actually at the agencies. At one agency, where the agent reported issue to Indians numbering from fourteen thousand to nearly seventeen thousand, we learn from good authority that the number has never exceeded eight thousand. At another, where the agent reported issue to nearly eleven thousand Indians, the best information on the subject goes to show that the number never exceeded five thousand.

But, as I said, all checks are now removed. The provision of the law for inspection of the accounts for payment was found to be an incubus upon the men who were making false claims, false enumerations and contracts, and it was repealed. Therefore this House should be more particular than ever to guard and revise this Indian appropriation bill, striking out everything where fraud can be perpetrated. The last part of the legislation which Congress passed for the purpose of establishing the Indian peace policy in the last four years has been repealed, and the men of the Indian "rings" are absolutely without guard, without check, without restraint, and can do what they please. They have it in their power to remove any honest agent who dares to interfere with them. But I fear the Indian ring is too strong even for this House.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I draw a strong line of distinction between the peace policy and the peace commissioners. I am not against either but in favor of both, but I believe the peace policy is much larger than the peace commission.

The gentleman refers to the action of Congress in regard to the peace commission. I agree with him in sentiment, but the peace policy is much larger than the peace commission.

But I understood him to say that the peace policy is a failure, and it was to that I made answer. If he did not say that, then my remark was not called for. I believe the peace policy is not a failure but a triumph, and that the peace commissioners have succeeded in doing good, and I hope they will still continue to do good.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assinaboines:

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, including transportation thereof, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their comfort, civilization, and improvement, (including pay of one detective, $900; one cook, $480; and two laborers, at $600 each,) $30,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the words:

Including pay of one detective, $900; one cook, $480; and two laborers, at $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of goods for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, $5,000.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 246 add the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to reserve from that portion of said annuities due or to become due the said Cheyenne Indians the sum of $2,500 for Adelaide German, and $2,500 for Julia German, two white children, aged five and seven years respectively, who were captured in Kansas by said Cheyenne Indians while en route from Georgia to Colorado, and cause the same to be placed to the credit of the said Adelaide and Julia German on the books of the Treasury of the United States, to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and use from time to time the income from the same in such manner as he may deem expedient for their maintenance, education, and support, until they attain the age of twenty-one years, when the principal and all unexpended interest shall be paid them. That if either said Adelaide German or Julia German shall die without issue, the whole sum due the decedent shall revert to the survivor; and should both die without issue the whole sum shall revert to the United States; but if either said Adelaide German or Julia German or both have lawful issue, then at the death of either parent the amount due to her in her own right or which she may have inherited shall become the inheritance of her own issue. That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and required to withhold from any tribe of Indians who may hold any captives other than Indians any moneys due them from the United States until such captives shall be surrendered to the lawful authority of the United States.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to say, in explanation of this amendment, that these are the two little white children who were recaptured by the Army from the Cheyennes but a few months ago. From the story of the children themselves, it appears that their parents were from the State of Georgia on their way to Colorado. And these two little girls with their parents, brothers, and sisters were captured by these Cheyenne Indians, and all put to death except these two little children.

This action is recommended by Colonel Miles, who was in command of the troops in the fight when these two girls were recaptured. It is recommended also by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and Congress has a precedent to follow. For in 1870 two girls were captured from the Kiowas and Comanches, who were not able even to give their names. Congress in that instance made an appropriation of $2,500 to each of them, to be placed in the Treasury, as this is to be placed; and moreover—what is an unusual thing for Congress to do—caused the rite of baptism to be performed on these two little children, giving them the name of Lincoln. Following that precedent, the committee thought the amendment should be adopted. It is in the direct line of the peace policy, because if these Indians will not be peaceable toward the United States and will not observe their treaty stipulations, the second condition of the obligation assumed by them in 1867 being to keep the peace toward all the people of the United States, then the Government, for the benefit of the people injured, should be permitted to collect smart-money from these Indians, in order that they may be taught to obey the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Confederated tribes and bands of Indians in Middle Oregon:

For first of five installments, fourth series, for beneficial objects, per second article of treaty of June 25, 1855, $2,000.

For sixteenth of twenty installments, for pay and subsistence of one physician, one sawyer, one miller, one superintendent of farming operations, and one schoolteacher, per fourth article of treaty of June 25, 1855, $5,600.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$5,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,100."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

Mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters:

For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may from time to time determine, including transportation thereof, instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $20,000: Provided, That the provisions of the general appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1875, by which $30,000 were appropriated to assist to civilize and remove the mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters to Fort Hall, be and are so modified that the amount of said appropriation is reduced to $15,000; and said appropriation shall not be conditioned upon their removal to Fort Hall; and $5,000 of said appropriation is hereby covered into the Treasury.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That in order to enable said Indians to commence farming operations the coming spring, $4,000 of said amount is hereby made available upon the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Navajoes:

For seventh of ten installments, of such articles of clothing, or raw material in lieu thereof, for ninety-one hundred and forty-one Navajo Indians, not exceeding five dollars per Indian, as per eighth article of treaty of June 1, 1868, $45,705.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That this appropriation may be available from the passage of this act; and that with the consent of the tribe $25,000 of the sum shall be expended for the purpose of stock, cattle, and sheep for the tribe.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. This clause is to provide clothing for these Indians. They have about one hundred and twenty thousand sheep. They make their own clothing and prefer to have this money go for stock. Therefore they desire that $25,000 shall be for sheep and cattle, and the balance for farming utensils.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nisqually, Puyallup, and other tribes and bands of Indians:

For last of twenty installments, in part payment for relinquishment of title to lands, to be applied to beneficial objects, per fourth article of treaty of December 26, 1854, $1,000.

For last of twenty installments, for pay of instructors, smith, carpenter, farmer, and physician, (who shall furnish medicine to the sick,) per tenth article of treaty of December 26, 1854, $6,700.

For last of twenty installments, for the support of an agricultural and industrial school, and support of smith and carpenter shop, and providing the necessary tools therefor, in conformity with the tenth article of treaty of December 26, 1854, $1,500.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out those paragraphs. I do this because that clause was inserted by mistake. The appropriation last year was for the last installment due these Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows under the head of "Pottawatomies:"

For educational purposes, $5,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out that clause. This appropriation has been made for forty-five years in accordance with the treaty made with these Indians, and it has been annually appropriated ever since. The provision of the treaty was that it was to be appropriated so long as Congress thought proper; and we think that inasmuch as we have been making this appropriation for forty-five years it is about time to stop it, and therefore I have been instructed by the committee to move to strike out the item.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows under the head of "Quapaws:"

For one farmer, during the pleasure of the President, per same treaty, $600.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out those lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, to be expended for such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President from time to time may determine, including transportation thereof, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, (including pay of five laborers, at $600 each per annum,) $30,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out the words in parenthesis, "including pay of five laborers at $600 each per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, to be expended by the direction of the President, in assisting the roving bands of Indians in Southeastern Idaho to move to and locate on the Fort Hall reservation in Idaho Territory, and to assist them in education and agricultural pursuits on said reservation, $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend that paragraph by adding to it the following:

And of this amount $4,000 shall be available at once to aid in preparations for planting crops.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I now ask unanimous consent to go back to page 33 of the bill, and to strike out the amendment which has already been adopted at the end of line 794, and which is as follows:

Provided, That in order to enable said Indians to commence farming operations the coming spring, $4,000 of said amount is hereby made available upon the passage of this act.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation, and the necessary expenses of delivering goods to be purchased for the different bands of the Sioux Indians, under treaty of April 29, 1868, $75,000: Provided, That the President may withhold the supplies from said Indians, or any band of them, until they shall consent to remain north of the Niobrara River, if he shall deem it expedient to do so.

Mr. STEELE. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of that paragraph:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for presents to the Siouxs of the Red Cloud and Whetstone or Spotted Tail agencies, on condition that said Indians shall surrender the right claimed under treaty stipulations to have the lands north of the North Platte River, east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, held and considered as unceded Indian territory, and also the right, so claimed, to hunt over the same, $50,000; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to negotiate with said Indians for the relinquishment and surrender of the said right and privilege.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to make an appropriation for the appointment of a commission to treat with the Indians for the surrender of certain rights which they now have in the Territory of Wyoming, to have a certain portion of that country considered as Indian territory with the right to hunt over it. That is now the provision of existing treaty, and it excludes citizens of the United States from one-third of the Territory of Wyoming.

The Indians are willing to surrender this privilege. This proposition is recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and by Bishop Hare, Rev. Mr. Hinman, and Dr. Cox, members of the commission to treat with the Sioux. The agent at the Red Cloud agency estimates that the Indians can be induced to relinquish this privilege for the amount here named. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 11th instant, inclosing a draught of an amendment or additional section to the Indian appropriation bill, proposing an appropriation of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for presents to the Sioux Indians of Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, on condition that said Indians shall surrender the right claimed under treaty stipulations, to have the land north of the North Platte River and east of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, held and considered as unceded Indian territory, and also the right, so claimed, to hunt over the same.

In reply I have respectfully to state that the objects proposed in the amendment referred to meet with the cordial approval of this office.

It is my opinion that an appropriation of the sum named would induce the Indians named to relinquish their right to the land in question, and put an end to the hunting parties north of the North Platte River, which have for some time at least been a source of continual annoyance to white settlers in that portion of the country, and no material advantage to the Indians engaged in such hunts.

The draught of your amendment is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. R. STEELE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. STEELE. It will be seen that this amendment meets the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; that he states it would be no hardship or injustice to the Indians, but simply a concession by them of a right which is of but little advantage to them. The concession would be a great benefit and advantage to the people of Wyoming Territory, and assist very materially in the advancement and development of that entire section of the country. Since this treaty has been in existence, these Indians have roamed and hunted over this portion of the Territory, to the very serious damage of the people of that region. I hope my amendment will meet the approval of this committee.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no doubt the object contemplated by the gentleman is a good one. But I do not feel inclined to adopt an amendment of this importance without having it first considered by some committee. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] that he had better withdraw his amendment and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if they approve it, it can be put upon the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. STEELE. I am willing to do anything to meet the wishes of the gentleman. I do not desire to antagonize this bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. And I wish to accommodate the gentleman if I can.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] to this fact: This subject has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs in a bill that came over from the Senate. That committee have considered the bill and are prepared to report in favor of the appointment of a commission to investigate and report what should be done. I do not think it prudent to appropriate money at present for this purpose. As we are to report in a day or two in favor of a commission for that purpose, I think this proposition had better be deferred.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think the amendment had better be withdrawn.

Mr. STEELE. I am willing to withdraw the amendment and have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHANKS. The Committee on Indian Affairs are prepared to report soon upon this subject.

Mr. STEELE. Permit me to say that this is a subject of vital importance to the people of that entire section of the country. The bill which the Committee on Indian Affairs have agreed to may not pass this session. When this letter was written by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs he was fully informed of the action which the Committee on Indian Affairs had taken upon the subject. So far as I was concerned in the matter I informed him fully of the action that had been taken. This amendment is to provide for this matter, in case the bill referred to by the gentleman should not become a law at the present session; if that bill should become a law, its provisions would be much more acceptable to me than the amendment here proposed.

Mr. SHANKS. This would be transacting the business of the Indian Department in the same irregular way that seems to have been followed from its first inception to a recent date. I think this matter should be carefully considered, so that the record may show the steps taken. I do not think it proper to appropriate money until we have ascertained what is to be done and what are the means necessary to be provided for the purpose. Last year there was appropriated $25,000 for this work. It only covers a part of the ground. The amount was not accepted by the Indians, and the Committee on Indian Affairs reports in favor of dealing with them again. That only shows the impropriety of attempting to appropriate money before we know what is to be done.

Mr. STEELE. I will withdraw the amendment, for the purpose of bringing the subject to the attention of the Committees on Appropriations and on Indian Affairs.

The committee rose informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3177) for the relief of DeWitt C. Chipman.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 909) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory;

A bill (S. No. 964) to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties; and

A bill (S. No. 1094) for the relief of Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the following:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in the Territory of Arizona, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $65,000.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I moved last year that a part of this sum be set aside for school purposes. I now submit a similar amendment. I move to insert after the words "civilized life" these words, "and for educactional purposes;" so that a part of this money may be used for the maintenance of schools.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Montana Territory:
For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Montana Territory, presents of goods, agricultural implements, and other useful articles, and to assist them to locate in permanent abodes, and sustain themselves by the pursuits of civilized life, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. On account of the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman [Mr. MAGINNIS] who represents Montana Territory, I very much question whether it is proper to appropriate anything as an incidental fund for that Territory. I gathered from his speech the idea that the management of Indian affairs up there is not altogether sound. I would like to hear from him on this subject. If it is true that this incidental fund or any fund is not being properly used in Montana Territory, we ought not to appropriate it. If the gentleman is mistaken about there being anything wrong there, then I suppose the appropriation is proper. There are a good many Indians there and a good many interests that ought to be cared for out of this incidental fund.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] can get the gentleman from Montana to go back upon his statement of yesterday, by holding in jeopardy the appropriation for his Territory.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I did not hear the remarks just made by the gentleman from Missouri. I would be glad if he would repeat them.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I gathered from the speech of the gentleman the idea that there was something wrong in his Territory in the administration of Indian affairs.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I simply answered a question put to me by gentlemen on both sides of the House in regard to a public matter of fact.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. If I was mistaken in my understanding of what the gentleman said, of course I withdraw my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman from Missouri contradict what the Delegate from Montana said yesterday?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. On what point?

Mr. RANDALL. In reference to Mr. Orville Grant.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Well, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The question of Indian traders has nothing to do with this fund.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out this appropriation (I believe he makes such a motion) looks rather like spite-work directed against the gentleman from Montana because he told the truth yesterday.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Not at all. I disclaim anything of that kind.

Mr. RANDALL. You want to punish the gentleman's Territory for what the gentleman said yesterday.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I simply answered a question coming from both sides of the House, and I answered it truthfully.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to correct the impression of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that there is anything like "spite-work" in my action about this matter. The gentleman from Montana gets no personal benefit from this appropriation; it is nothing to him personally.

Mr. RANDALL. But the omission of the appropriation might go to show that the gentleman has not perhaps the influence he should have as a representative of the Territory.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not offer any amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Every dollar of the Indian fund misappropriated in my Territory for political purposes is used against me.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington Territory:
For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Washington Territory, including transportation of annuity goods and presents, (where no special provision is made therefor by treaties,) and for defraying the expenses of removal and subsistence of Indians, and for pay of necessary employés, $25,000.

Mr. SHANKS. I move to amend the clause just read by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That $2,000 of this fund shall be applied to the support of schools in the Colville agency.

Mr. McCORMICK. That is just what I desired in regard to my Territory; but the committee would not consent.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not like the idea of this incidental fund being appropriated for special objects. It is a fund designed for the entire Territory; and I think it best to allow the Secretary of the Interior to appropriate it wherever he thinks most necessary.

Mr. SHANKS. These Indians have no fund of their own. The Government has taken all their lands without giving them a dollar of money or even a home of any kind. They have no means whatever of their own. They make their own living; they cost the Government nothing except this general appropriation for the Territory. I ask that this provision be made in their behalf.

Mr. McFADDEN. Another reason in favor of the amendment is that as to the other reservations of the Territory provision is made for educational purposes. The omission is only as to this reservation. Last year this clause was amended precisely in accordance with the amendment now suggested by the gentleman from Indiana. Schools have been maintained there under the appropriation made last year. But if the appropriation be now refused, those schools must be discontinued, and great dissatisfaction will result.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. My only objection to the amendment is that I do not like to confine the Secretary of the Interior to any particular object when we appropriate money as an incidental fund for the Territory. I have no doubt that if this school is necessary and proper and legitimate, he will devote this amount to its maintenance; but I prefer to leave the matter with the Secretary of the Interior. I move, therefore, to amend the amendment so as to insert in lieu of the words proposed these words: "and for educational purposes."

Mr. SHANKS. The objection to that is that it would apply to other agencies where they have a fund. These people have no fund. That is the reason I ask the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The whole question will be in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. If other agencies have a fund, of course this fund will not be appropriated there. The Delegate from Arizona [Mr. McCORMICK] asked a similar amendment in regard to his Territory; but the committee declined to assent to it, though they did not object to inserting the words "for educational purposes," leaving the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am satisfied that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] should not be adopted, then, under the interpretation which will be given to this paragraph, not one dollar of this money will ever be devoted to educational purposes on the Colville reservation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move, as a substitute, to insert after the word "Indians," in line 1623, the words "and for educational purposes."

The substitute was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For insurance and transportation of annuities, and the necessary expenses of the delivery of the annuities and provisions to the Indian tribes in Minnesota and Michigan, $4,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to insert in line 1636 the word "Wisconsin," between "Minnesota" and "Michigan."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For second installment of annuity, to be paid to Ouray, so long as he shall be chief of the Ute Indians, $1,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move at the end of line 1644 to add the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the fund set apart in the Treasury of the United States by virtue of the fourth and fifth sections of an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1848, shall be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and benefit of the eastern band of the Cherokee Indians, to perfect the titles to their lands recently awarded to them by a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the western district of North Carolina; to the payment of such costs, charges, expenses, and liabilities attending their recent litigations in the said court as the Secretary of the Interior may determine to be properly chargeable to them; to purchase and extinguish the titles of any white person or persons within the general boundaries allotted to them by the said decree of said court, and for the education, improvement, and civilization of the said Indians.

Mr. RANDALL. I will reserve the point of order on that amendment until I hear some explanation from the Committee on Appropriations showing its necessity.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think I can explain it so that all objection on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be removed. The Cherokee Indians of North Carolina have a certain amount of money in the Treasury of the United States upon which they have been drawing interest annually for many years. Recently they have come into possession of five thousand acres of land in that State by decree of the court. They desire to go upon that land and improve it, and therefore it is they ask for this money for that purpose. The decree of the court which gives them the land also provided that some $30,000 of a lien upon it shall be paid by the Indians before their title shall be perfected. The counsel of the Cherokees of North Carolina have asked to be permitted to draw from their principal in the Treasury enough money for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. Thirty thousand dollars is only required to pay off this lien.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It will take $30,000 to pay off the lien upon the land, but they ask for $50,000 out of the $80,000 of their money now in the Treasury to enable them to improve this land. It is their own money, and nothing is asked to be paid by the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. But it is rather an inconvenient time to pay it out.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. They have need of this money to improve their land, and it ought to be given to them.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general incidental expenses of the Indian service at the various agencies within the northern superintendency, including rent, fuel, light, stationery, and traveling expenses of the superintendent and agents, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, $2,000.

Mr. AVERILL. I move to add the following after line 1717.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the collection of statistics and historical data respecting the Indians of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $3,500.

Mr. AVERILL. That is one of the items of estimates sent in here from the Indian Department, but has been inadvertently omitted in this bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is correct. It was overlooked by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That, except where otherwise provided by law, not more than $6,000 shall be paid for salaries of employés at any one agency, in addition to the salaries of the agent and the interpreter, and not more at any agency than is absolutely necessary; and where Indians of the tribe can perform the duties they shall be employed; and Indian agents shall be required to state under oath, upon rendering their quarterly accounts, that the employés claimed for were actually and bona fide employed at such agency and at the compensation as claimed, and that such service was necessary; and that such agent does not receive, or has not received, directly or indirectly, any part of the compensation claimed for any other employé, or any pecuniary benefit therefrom: Provided, That when there is no officer authorized to administer oaths within convenient reach of such agent, the Secretary of the Interior may direct such returns to be made upon certificate of the agent: And provided further, That for the following agencies, namely, the Cheyenne River agency, the Spotted Tail agency, the Grand River agency, the Red Cloud agency, the Upper Missouri agency, the Kiowa agency, the Witchita agency, and the Yakama agency, the Secretary of the Interior may authorize an expenditure for employés in excess of the aforesaid limit, but in no case to exceed $10,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move the following substitute for that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That not more than $6,000 shall be paid in any one year for salaries or compensation of employés at any one agency in addition to the salaries of the agent, and not more at any one agency than is absolutely necessary; and where Indians can perform the duties they shall be employed; and the number and kind of employés at each agency shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and none others shall be employed. Indian agents shall be required to state under oath, upon rendering their quarterly accounts, that the employés claimed for were actually and bona fide employed at such agency and at the compensation as claimed, and that such service was necessary; and that such agent is not to receive, and has not received, directly or indirectly, any part of the compensation claimed for any other employé: Provided, That when there is no officer authorized to administer oaths within convenient distance of such agent, the Secretary of the Interior may direct such returns to be made upon certificate of the agent: And provided further, That in case it should be necessary at any agencies to have more employés than provided for in this section, the Secretary may, by written order, authorize the increase necessary; but in no case shall the amount expended at any agency exceed $10,000 in any one year.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the following, to come in as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that no purchase of goods, supplies, or farming implements, or any other article whatsoever, the cost of which shall exceed fifty dollars, shall be paid for from the money appropriated by this bill, unless the same shall have been previously advertised and contracted for as heretofore provided by law; and no payment of any part of the money appropriated by this act, or heretofore appropriated for the expenses of the Indian Department, shall be credited to any Government officer until the proper vouchers therefor shall first have been submitted to, examined, and authorized by the accounting officers of the Treasury: And provided further, That copies of all contracts made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or any other officer of the Government, for the Indian service, shall be furnished to the Second Auditor of the Treasury before any payment shall be made thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, in explanation of that amendment, I will say that there are three distinct purposes I have in view. In the first place, during the year 1873 there were goods purchased without contracts to the amount of $873,587.66—an enormous sum; and, as I am apprised, at prices far in excess of the real value.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. When did that occur?

Mr. RANDALL. In 1873. Last year the same thing occurred. There was the same law and the same practice.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman will make the amount $300, I will agree to that portion of the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well, I will make that the amount. I only want to prevent this enormous amount of purchases without contracts.

Well, sir, the second provision of my amendment will of course recommend itself to everybody. The third is that copies of all these contracts shall be placed in the hands of the Second Auditor, who settles for all these purchases, that he may have a copy of the contract by him, so as to see that the bills that come in are in accord with the contract made.

Mr. FORT. That is all right.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask that the gentleman's amendment may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to say to my excellent friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I will go as far as he will in anything that is practicable in the way of throwing safeguards around the expenditure of this Indian appropriation, which is very large and ought to be most thoroughly guarded. But I am afraid this provision would not be found practicable in far distant Territories. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs told me a few days ago that he is now paying on an average 20 per cent. more than he would have to pay if the payments were promptly made. All manner of delays occur. There are not only delays on accout of advertising and delays in communication, but delays in the board of peace commissioners and delays in the various Departments and Bureaus where these accounts have to go. I believe the Indians will never be able to get their supplies at a reasonable rate until the mode of payment is made more simple instead of more complicated than now.

Mr. RANDALL. I will read to the gentleman what I have had furnished to me in a letter bearing on this point, premising that I believe this would in a great measure do away with the necessity for deficiencies:

Heretofore the greater number of Indian agencies were remote from mail and telegraphic communications; and the Indians were wild, non-resident on reservations, and unmanageable; and it often became necessary for an agent to make purchases at an hour's notice for presents as a peace measure, or as an inducement toward the attainment of a particular object. This is all changed. There is not an agent in the service now who cannot with the commonest forethought estimate three months in advance for every item necessary for his agency. Troops are stationed at the agencies where the wilder Indians resort to protect the agents and the property of the Government; so that the contingencies which have up to the present time created the necessity for large expenditures without contract and thus left open a way to huge frauds no longer to exist, and there is no good reason why Indian agents should not be required to estimate in advance for everything they need. Then Congress will be certain of the amount to be expended each year when they appropriate a fixed sum. Now, a deficiency bill is a sure sequence of the regular appropriation bill each year. The officers of the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments of the Army are required to state in advance their requirements for each period, and are allowed to purchase nothing without special authority. No one will say, in view of the history of the Indian Bureau or the allegations against it, that this appropriation is not necessary.

I think that is a very full answer to the gentleman's objection. It is not my object to embarrass, and therefore I immediately agreed to the proposition to make the limitation $300.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. To my mind there is one very serious objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] It strikes me that the effect of the adoption of that proposition in its present form would be that all of these supplies would be furnished by a few men in the older and larger cities of the country. I have been informed by the gentleman who represents the Territory of Arizona, and other gentlemen, that flour and many other articles can be furnished in that country on the ground—especially flour, which is now manufactured there—and supplied to the agencies much cheaper than the transported articles.

Mr. RANDALL. Why cannot we contract for these?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Because I believe when you require supplies to be purchased in great quantities, if you advertise in that way, a few men coming here get the contracts, and few of these men away out on the frontier ever see the advertisement. And if they do, they cannot afford to come to where the contracts are made out and compete with these men who have large establishments in Philadelphia, Chicago, and at other points.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to say that I do not believe there are any contractors for the Indian service in Philadelphia.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will call the gentleman's attention to a circumstance I have knowledge of in his own city. As it happened, the Government derived benefit from it. A gentleman in Philadelphia, engaged in the business of manufacturing blankets, manufactured all the blankets that were supplied to these Indians for several years. He furnished a good blanket and at a reasonable price. I have no complaint to make as to that. But believing last year that as a matter of course he would get the contract, he went on and had the supply of blankets made up with the United States brand upon them; and as he could not sell them to anybody else, the consequence was that he was compelled to let the Government have the blankets for 10 per cent. less than they actually cost. Here is one instance where the whole supply of blankets was furnished by one man. Now if the Indians of Arizona and New Mexico can be furnished with blankets made by the Navajo Indians, made by their skill and industry, I prefer that it should be done rather than the contract should be given to contractors in the large cities of the Union. If you can get these supplies for these Indians from those men who are on the spot, from the pioneers who have gone out to tame the wilderness and desert, give those men the preference over the merchants of Saint Louis, Chicago, New York, or any other place. I believe, sir, that many of the articles required by the Government for the Indian service can be purchased on the ground and furnished to the Indians for less, considering the cost of transportation, than by any of the gentlemen who hold these contracts.

For this reason I believe I will oppose this amendment. I thought it was all right when the gentleman first offered it, but the tendency of it would be to put a monopoly of the whole business of furnishing supplies for the Indian service into the hands of gentlemen who see the advertisements, and who live near or in cities and are constantly on hand to make bids for these contracts.

Mr. RANDALL. I have nothing whatever to do with any contractors. I supposed that in offering this amendment I was rather striking at them, and preventing contractors, both large and small, from improperly making money out of the Indian Bureau. I still think the amendment would have that effect.

Now in reference to this subject I am at a loss to know why we should adopt a different policy in regard to the Indian Department from that adopted in reference to the Army. The Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary Department both provide in advance for the supplies that will be needed. They make estimates as to what will be required, and then they know exactly how much money they are going to spend. The object of the amendment is to prevent any expenditure of money without proper and due authority of law. As I stated before, there were in 1873 eight hundred and seventy-six odd thousand dollars expended without any authority of law, without any contract; and I have shown the House, and my statement stands uncontradicted, that in almost every instance these purchases were made at a price largely advanced over the contract price. I do not, sir, wish to prevent gentlemen living in the frontier settlements from selling their goods to the Government, but the gentleman cannot convince me that a man who happens to have a few goods out in one of the Territories can afford to sell them cheaper than a large contractor can, who has every facility for producing them and who is largely engaged in manufacturing the goods he sells.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think no one could for a moment suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] introduced this amendment for any but the very best purpose; but I want to call his attention to the condition of affairs in my own Territory. There the military have been directed to drive the Indians on to reservations. They are now doing so with all the power they possess. Many of the Indians have been brought upon reservations, but it is impossible for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to tell in advance how many will be upon reservations at any given time. He cannot possibly tell now many will come upon reservations next week or the week after, and therefore he cannot possibly estimate just what amount of supplies he must provide. This can be done in the case of the Army, because there the matter is reduced to a system; but everything on the frontier is unsettled and unorganized and unregulated, and we cannot tell from week to week what supplies may be needed for any one reservation, because it all depends upon the movements of Indians who are yet comparatively wild. I want the matter left in such shape that in case of any exigency or emergency there should be a sufficient appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. What does the gentleman suggest? I say that in my judgment this expenditure of large sums of money without due authority of law is what brings criticism upon the management of the Indian Department. This amendment is in the right direction, and I hope it will not be objected to. I do not want to embarrass the Indian Department in its honest administration, and if it is found that this amendment will embarrass it, it can be stricken out in the Senate. But I would like to have it go in here, so that we can at least hear from the Department and know whether this is in contravention of the true interests of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior and the officers charged by law with the distribution of supplies to the Indians under appropriations made by law, to distribute them and pay them out to the Indians entitled to them in such proper proportions as that the amount of appropriation made for the current year shall not be expended before the end of such current year, so as to prevent deficiencies; and no expenditure shall be made or liability incurred on the part of the Government on account of the Indian service for any fiscal year (unless in compliance with existing law) beyond the amount of money previously appropriated for said service during such year.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask permission to go back and offer an amendment, to come in after the word "dollars," in line 1717, as follows:

And the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated for the construction of a hospital at Round Valley reservation, California.

I think this hospital is a necessity. While I was visiting that reservation I made inquiries, and ascertained that nearly 50 per cent. of the Indians on that reservation are afflicted with a loathsome disease. They have no hospital, no shelter, and in many instances the only shelter was grass or thatched huts. The physician there, a very estimable gentleman, informed me that it was utterly impossible for him to cure these Indians or prevent the spread of this disease, unless he could have a hospital in which he could keep them until they recovered. Humanity demands that this amendment should be adopted. There are on that reservation from seven to eight hundred human beings, 50 per cent. of whom are suffering in this way. I have a letter from the agent, which I received yesterday, reporting to me that two hundred and nineteen of that number are blind from the effects of this disease. The appropriation which I ask for is very small, and humanity demands that we shall establish a hospital for the cure of the afflicted ones. There are one hundred and twenty-five females and ninety-four males, making a total of two hundred and nineteen, that are now blind from this disease.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend the amendment, so as to take that amount out of the incidental fund for California.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will accept that amendment to the amendment. I merely want to have some provision made for a hospital on this reservation.

Mr. SHANKS. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I know the condition of that reservation, and that there is a necessity for a hospital there.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That all appropriations made for teachers, millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons employed in the Indian service, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulations, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of various Indian tribes, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of said tribes expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress, at the next session thereafter, of his action under this provision: Provided, That the office of board of peace commissioners is hereby abolished, and the balance of the appropriations heretofore made for the same which are unexpended, is hereby covered into the Treasury.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to strike out the proviso in the section just read.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I make a point of order on it.

Mr. RANDALL. Was not that proviso reported from the committee?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It was. The sub-committee put it in; but on consultation with the Secretary of the Interior—we did not consult with him in the first place—he informs us that this board should be permitted to remain; that it is doing a good work. I think nobody objects to striking out this proviso.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to it. I think that board is utterly useless, and I want to abolish it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I make the point of order that this proviso proposing to abolish this board is new legislation, and therefore not in order in an appropriation bill. This peace commission exists in pursuance of law.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the point is too late.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rose and made the point of order when the section was first reached, but the gentleman struck in at the same time. Before any debate was raised I stated that I made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon that statement of the gentleman the Chair will rule that the point is in time, and that it is well taken.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the gentleman tell us who are the peace commissioners; let him name them.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not remember all their names. One is General Clinton B. Fisk, of Saint Louis, a republican in politics.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care about their politics.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Another is General Sibley, a democrat. The thing is pretty well divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso has been ruled out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I would inquire if one of these peace commissioners is not an officer of a railroad, that has a direct interest with reference to certain Indian lands?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. RANDALL. I allude to the chairman of the board, who is secretary and treasurer of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. I want to know whether there are not certain lands in connection with this Indian reservation which will accrue to that company in case of certain decisions of the court. I want to direct attention to the matter, because I do not consider that he is a proper man to be upon that board. I know nothing against his character for integrity, but he certainly has an interest adverse to the interests of the Government and the people.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I do not know to whom the gentleman has reference.

Mr. RANDALL. I refer to Mr. Fisk.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso has been ruled out of order, and no debate upon it is in order.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. As the gentleman has asked me a question, I desire to answer it. I do not know anything about the private affairs of General Fisk. I know this, however, upon the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, that the members of this board of peace commissioners were appointed upon the recommendation of the different churches of the country. If there are improper men upon that board, the churches have made mistakes in their recommendations. But I am inclined to think that this board of peace commissioners is composed of good men. I do not know anything against them. General Fisk stands high as a citizen in the State of Missouri and in the city where he resides. All of these men work without any compensation whatever; it is purely a labor of love and charity and Christianity on their part.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, the churches are not always right in their recommendations. I am rather inclined to think that this is a bad year at best for Christian churches and ministers!

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior cause to be prepared and delivered to the Public Printer, on or before the 1st day of November in each year, a tabular statement of the items paid out up to that date of the appropriations made for the Indian Department for the fiscal year previously ending, each item being placed under the appropriation from which it was paid, in such manner as to show the disposition made of each appropriation and the amount unexpended of each; also an itemized statement of the salaries and incidental expenses paid at each agency for the said year, and the appropriations out of which paid, and the number of Indians at each agency; and that the same be laid before Congress on the first day of the succeeding session; and that the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the reports of agents, be printed and laid before Congress on the first day of the said session.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend by adding to the section just read the following:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to let any Indian reservation to any competent and trustworthy person who will undertake to control, manage, and educate the Indians on such reservation, or belonging to any of the agencies by this bill contemplated, without cost to the Government, such person to give bond in such sum as may be prescribed by said Commissioner for the faithful performance of such duty.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I reserve a point of order on this amendment, though of course I have no objection to allowing the gentleman from California to make his statement.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Chairman, I submitted this amendment this morning to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who finds no objection to it. I will state the reasons which influence me in offering it. In my own district there are two or three reservations, embracing the very best agricultural lands in the State of California. Many of the Indians there are good farmers, able and willing to perform just as much work as anybody. Yet, sir, we every year appropriate thousands of dollars to carry on those reservations, when in fact, as I am prepared to show, there is sold from the reservations a surplus of products—beef, bacon, pork, grain, hay, and vegetables. I have received communications from some of the most respectable men in my district, offering to take these reservations and carry them on, feeding, educating, and clothing the Indians, furnishing everything necessary, and without compensation from the Government, they being content with the surplus which they can obtain from the reservation. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from one of the most respectable citizens of my district, a man who can give bonds to the amount of $500,000, if necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

SANTA ROSA, November 28, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Thinking that there might be some changes made in the Indian Department at Washington City in regard to the "Round Valley reservation," now under the management of one Burchard, I drop you a line, that should there be any I will make this proposition, to wit: I will take the reservation with what stock and fixtures there are on it; give the Indians all the privileges and advantages that can be given in obtaining educational and religious advantages; support, feed, and clothe them so that they may be comfortable in every respect, attending to all their necessary wants, for the term of five years, (with the privilege of ten,) including the live stock, lands, and fixtures, the proceeds after the Indians are cared for to be my own, not costing the Government anything. I will take account of all stock and invoice anything that may be there necessary to carry on said reservation, and will receipt for the same. And I will give any security the Goverment may require, and will bind myself to return all live stock and fixtures in number and good condition as I received them, with natural wear and tear excepted.

Your very obedient servant,

JOHN MATHEWS.

Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL,
Washington City.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Some seven or eight other citizens in my district have offered to take charge of those reservations and feed, clothe, and educate the Indians free of charge to the Government. The amendment leaves the matter discretionary with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I believe that by the adoption of the amendment hundreds of thousands of dollars can be saved to the Government annually.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Does the gentleman propose to reduce these Indians to a state of peonage?

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir; but I will say to the gentleman that on one reservation which I visited last summer the Indians are worked just like peons; not only that, but, as shown by affidavits and by the confession of the agent himself, which I have here, the Indians are stripped, tied up, and whipped like dogs, just as was done in days gone by in the Southern States with the negroes. No negro in the South was ever treated worse than some of these Indians have been treated. Besides the affidavits, I have the admission of the agent himself that he does whip them.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I presume that the gentleman, as deputy inspector, has reported all these things to the Department.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir; I have. I say that the treatment of the Indians as now conducted is in many cases a system of slavery. I am opposed to whipping any man, be he black or white.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Will the gentleman state the name of the agent who does this?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Rev. J. L. Burchard.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. On what reservation?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The Round Valley reservation.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. In California?

Mr. LUTTRELL. In California.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Is he the agent now?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. When was he appointed?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Some two or three years ago.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. To what denomination does he belong?

Mr. LUTTRELL. The Methodist, I am sorry to say. He is also a republican. He was what was called a "southern democrat" during the war; but at the close of the rebellion he became a republican, and the position he holds is his reward.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I now insist on my point of order. I think the debate has gone far enough. My point is that this reservation as well as others is established by law, and that the amendment proposes to change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 27, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That hereafter all bidders under any advertisement published by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for proposals for goods, supplies, transportation, and so forth, for and on account of the Indian service, whenever the value of the goods, supplies, and so forth, to be furnished, or the transportation to be performed, shall exceed the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check, or draft payable to the order of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, upon some United States depository or some one of such solvent national banks as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, which check or draft shall be 5 per cent. on the amount of the goods, supplies, transportation, and so forth, as aforesaid; and in case any such bidder, on being awarded a contract, shall fail to execute the same with good and sufficient sureties according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, such bidder shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury of the United States; but if such contract shall be duly executed, as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the words "and so forth," as I do not think such a vague indefinite term should be allowed to remain in any general appropriation bill. If there be no objection, I move that they be stricken out wherever they occur in the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not object.

Mr. GARFIELD. They ought to be stricken out wherever they occur.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I move to add as an additional section the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the security or securities upon the bond required by the act of February 27, 1851, to be given by each Indian agent before entering upon the duties of his office shall file a sworn statement with the Secretary of the Interior setting forth the nature and kind of property owned by such security or securities, the value of the same, and where situated; and no money appropriated by this bill shall be paid to any Indian agent hereafter appointed until the security or securities shall have filed such statement.

Mr. STORM. I hope there will be no objection to that amendment. It is proper that it should be adopted.

Mr. FORT. It is only providing that securities of these like all other officers shall make this necessary statement.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I now ask to go back to page 9, line 189.

The Clerk read as follows:

Apaches:

For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico and Arizona, namely: for those in Arizona, $300,000; and for those in New Mexico, $100,000, $400,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be expended only in behalf of those Indians who go and remain upon said reservations and refrain from hostilities.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move that be amended so it will read "Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico," so as to distinguish them from the Apaches in the western part of the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I now ask to return to page 20, line 462.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $390,257.92, at 5 per cent. per annum, for education, support of the government, and other beneficial purposes, under the direction of the general council of the Choctaws, in conformity with the provisions contained in the ninth and thirteenth articles of treaty of January 20, 1825, and treaty of June 22, 1855, $19,512.89.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move after the word "cents," in line 462, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay out of this amount the sum of $500, and interest thereon from October 1, 1869, to January 1, 1875, $183.75, due William P. Lyon & Son for printing the laws of the Choctaw Nation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move the following as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness that may be due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund, arising under the provisions of the treaty with the Creek Nation of March 24, 1832; whereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue United States 5 per cent. registered bonds, with interest accruing on the same from July 1, 1874, and which said bonds shall be held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior, who may, at the request of the said orphans or their legal representatives, cause the same to be converted into money, to be applied for the benefit of the Creek orphans of 1832, or their legal heirs and representatives, in accordance with the provisions of said treaty, in such sums and at such times as may be required: Provided, That no part of said money herein provided for shall be paid or delivered until the Creek council shall, by act duly passed, and a certified copy thereof filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, certifying by name and amounts severally the persons entitled thereto as such orphans or their legal heirs, to whom it shall be severally paid: And provided further, That any excess that shall remain of said fund, after paying said orphans and heirs as hereinbefore provided, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be retained by the Government of the United States for the purpose of refunding to the Treasury of the United States the amount paid to and for certain loyal Creek refugees in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress approved February 22, 1862; and that, further, any balance of said fund shall be placed in the treasury of the Creek Nation, and become a common fund of said Creek Nation, and become a national fund, to be used by them as they may in council determine: And provided further, That no officer of the Government of the United States shall either entertain, recognize, or pay to any claim agent, attorney, or pretended attorney any fee or compensation for any services rendered or pretended to have been rendered in the presentation of this claim.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order on this amendment. The law has placed this money in the Treasury and provided that it shall remain there, and therefore this amendment is out of order, as it changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, made upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. It is for the benefit of these Creek orphans. No controversy can arise about the justice of the claim. Those who were orphans at the time the claim originated have been paid, and the money should not be withheld longer from these Creek orphans. The Government has withheld this money, and now, these orphans having arrived at maturity, it should be paid to them just as it was paid to the others in 1832.

Mr. STORM. This is a very important matter, and as it is somewhat complicated I think we ought to consider it separately. If my colleague does not insist on his point of order I will renew it.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point that this is new legislation, and therefore not in order on this bill. If this be the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, it can be taken up and considered in its order when that committee is called for reports.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. It has been reported and is now upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I have been informed this committee has a special assignment. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

Mr. COMINGO. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION —. That in order to fulfill and discharge the obligations of the United States under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes or nations of Indians, concluded June 22, 1855, and in order to provide for the payment and satisfaction of the award of the Senate, made on the 9th day of March, 1859, under the provisions of article 11 of said treaty, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, upon the passage of this act, to pay to P. P. Pitchlyn and Peter Folsom, the authorized agents of said Choctaw Nation, or to either of them, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,981,247.30, the amount of said award, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of said award until the payment thereof, as herein provided; Provided, however, That the sum of $250,000, heretofore paid in part discharge of said award, shall be deducted from the amount at the date of said part payment; and that the payment of said award to said Pitchlyn and Folsom, or either of them, as herein directed, shall be in full satisfaction and discharge of all the claims of the said nation, and of those of the individual members thereof, on account of said award: And provided further, That the said sum shall be paid by said agents, under the direction and supervision of the United States Indian agent, to the claimants entitled thereto, as is provided and required by the twelfth article of said treaty of 1855: And provided further, That before the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the said award to the said delegates, as herein provided, the national council of the Choctaw Nation shall pass an act in approval of this act, and shall accept the payment of the said award, as herein provided, as a full discharge and satisfaction of all the claims of the said nation, or of individual members thereof, on account of the said award.

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. This amendment involves two or three millions dollars, and ought to be printed.

Mr. STORM. Meanwhile I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I was about to remark that this involves about three million dollars, and ought to be printed. After the committee rises, I will move in the House that the amendment be printed, and the point of order can be reserved.

Mr. COMINGO. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the amendment last offered to the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole be printed, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RECUSANT WITNESS—R. B. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chairs lays before the House the following communication received from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1875.

SIR: I respectfully report to you, and through you to the House of Representatives, that on the 9th day of January, 1875, a writ of habeas corpus was served upon me directing me to produce the body of Richard B. Irwin, detained in my custody, before Arthur MacArthur, one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on the 12th day of said January; that thereafter, on the 12th day of January aforesaid, the time for producing the body of said Irwin was further extended to January 14, at eleven o'clock a. m., at which time I appeared before the said Judge MacArthur and presented, through my attorney, Hon. Samuel Shellabarger, the warrant and resolutions of the House of Representatives upon which said Irwin was held in my custody. Whereupon, Judge MacArthur decided that no return would be received by him until the body of the said Irwin was produced in court.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the production of the said Richard B. Irwin by me would release him from my custody as an officer of the House of Representatives, and place him in the custody of the court, I asked for delay until to-morrow, January 15, at eleven o'clock a. m., to obtain further instructions from the House of Representatives.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. G. ORDWAY.

Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives United States.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether this witness is what the old law-books called in carcere duro? I make the inquiry because I have seen various statements in the public prints as to the manner in which he is kept and how he is entertained, &c.

Mr. DAWES. I find some difficulty in answering the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, owing to a defect in my early classical education, but I shall endeavor as well as I know how to answer him.

Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the communication of the Sergeant-at-Arms is a very serious one, affecting as it does the power of the House of Representatives, and it invokes the calm and considerate judgment of the House. It was admitted by the Committee on Ways and Means, before whom this was laid, that it was proper to be considered by the House rather than the committee, and that the House should give the Sergeant-at-Arms their instructions. He is required by the judge who has issued this writ, before any further proceedings are had upon it, to bring the body of Richard B. Irwin into court. It follows when he has done that and made his return upon the writ, that the witness is thereafter out of his custody and in that of the court; that the court has control over him and may make such disposition of him as it may deem proper. The law gives five days to answer the return, and as much longer time as the judge may deem proper. In the mean time the judge may consider what is a proper place to keep him in or may admit him to bail. The House will see at once that if it is the law of the land which the House of Representatives must obey, this witness, following the order of the court, has the door open to him for escape. With such an amount of money in his pocket and at his command as his own testimony shows, it would be a matter of pecuniary calculation whether it would be worth while to pay any ordinary bail.

I desire to state to the House the law on this matter and leave it for such action as the House may deem best. My own opinion is that the question is of so grave a character that it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to report to-morrow, if it be possible, something that may go upon the record and be a guide to the House. I think this court, although it has appointed to-morrow at eleven o'clock to hear this question, would nevertheless, if the Sergeant-at-Arms declined to bring Irwin into court until the Committee on the Judiciary should report, allow further time. The statute requires anybody who applies for a writ of habeas corpus to set forth so far as he is able the grounds upon which the party is detained. The petition in this case, although it contains some matter that is not strictly true, does set forth with sufficient clearness that this party is detained by order of the House of Representatives because the House of Representatives has adjudged him in contempt for not answering questions put to him by a committee of the House and by order of the House; so that the petition upon which this writ was granted discloses the fact that he is detained in custody because this House has judged him in contempt.

The circuit court of the District of Columbia in the Nugent case, where a very elaborate opinion was given, and where all the authorities it seems to me were very elaborately considered, has decided that every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, is sole judge of its own contempts, and that that court or any other has no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the Senate and House of Representatives upon that question. It seems therefore very strange to me that this judge, under this section of the statute, with the matter upon the record before him, should have decided that he had jurisdiction.

It seems to me that the court in that case applied the settled law of the land to it, and decided that the party was not entitled to this writ. This judge, however, has assumed jurisdiction, and has issued his writ. Sometimes courts issue writs improvidently, ex parte, upon applications made to them, without due consideration, and a very proper motion sometimes is to the court to dismiss the writ because it was improvidently issued. Counsel for the Sergeant-at-Arms have made that motion to-day and argued the case before the court and the court has dismissed their application, and as they understood it has substantially decided that the court has jurisdiction; the court overruled the motion, and required the Sergeant-at-Arms to make return. He has made a return, setting forth the order of the House and the grounds for that order; and that return the court has refused to receive unless he brings this party into court, and the court has intimated that having brought him into court he (the judge) will take charge of him, and judge himself of the fitness of the place to which he will order him to be committed or admit him to bail if he sees fit.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman—and it is quite in the line of his argument—what the petition was for? Was it for a change of the place of confinement or for liberation?

Mr. DAWES. It is not usual to issue a writ of habeas corpus for a petition to change the place of confinement. I stated that the judge has intimated that when he got this man into his possession he would judge of the fitness of the place where he would keep him or admit him to bail, as he saw fit.

I read now from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 12 Wallace, page 400, in the case of Barth vs. Clise, sheriff:

When a sheriff, in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus, makes a proper return and brings his prisoner before the court which issued the writ, the safe-keeping of the prisoner while he is before it is entirely under the control and direction of the court to which the return is made. The sheriff is accordingly not responsible for escape of the prisoner while thus in the custody of the court and before a remand or other order placing new duties on him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all this is the law of the land, which this House must obey, provided this court, in point of fact, has jurisdiction and authority to make the order; and whether the court has authority to make the order is the whole question involved in this case. It was suggested that the Sergeant-at-Arms might make his return that he has this person in court but still retain custody of him. The court then would be at issue with the House of Representatives upon the question whether it had jurisdiction, but could nevertheless force him out of the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Now, will any one say that an inferior court of the District of Columbia may exercise authority over the House of Representatives, and can say to this House that it may or shall not, according to the pleasure of that inferior court, pursue such investigation as the House in its judgment may deem wise and proper within its own jurisdiction? I do not mean to intimate by any of my remarks that this court has any desire or disposition to travel beyond its own conviction of duty. It may be acting, as I doubt not it is, with as pure motives as any of us. But I am calling the attention of the House of Representatives to the serious character of the question before us.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman has referred to certain intimations of this judge as to what he would do if the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House makes the common return in a case of habeas corpus and brings the party before that judge. I would ask the gentleman if he has any intimation further from that judge as to what he will do, or what he will attempt to do, if the House directs its officer to make no further return?

Mr. DAWES. I have not. The Sergeant-at-Arms, through his counsel, deemed it wise to lay this matter before the House of Representatives, under whose order he was acting, believing that it involved a question of gravity enough to command the serious judgment of the House; for it is setting a precedent which lies right across the path that the House is pursuing. If properly decided, I think it will contribute largely to clear up any doubt that may arise in the minds of witnesses when they are before any committee of this House. My experience is that these doubts first arise before the committees. The most troublesome thing in the minds of witnesses when they are upon the stand is what is the exact jurisdiction of the committee or of the House. And in nine cases out of ten the first answer is that they doubt the authority of the committee.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] whether there has been any case in the District of Columbia where, upon a writ of habeas corpus, the court has attempted to inquire into the propriety or legality of an order of the House or of the Senate directing that a party should be held in custody for contempt?

Mr. DAWES. There has been no such case to my knowledge. I do not profess to be conversant with the authorities upon this subject so far as to enlighten the House. I will state, however, that so far as I know no court has ever attempted to go behind the judgment of either branch of Congress. There may be something different in the decisions of the State courts. But this is the first time that any judge has attempted to go behind the record of the judgment of either House of Congress.

Mr. BURCHARD. Has the attention of the gentleman been called to the petition that accompanies this writ? My recollection is that the petition does not disclose the fact that the witness is now confined for a contempt of the House. My impression is that it states that the witness is confined for safe-keeping, awaiting the action of the grand jury, under the statute of 1857. I wish the chairman would present that petition to the House. It may be that it does allege that he is held upon an order alleging him in contempt of the House.

Mr. DAWES. The attention of the committee was called directly to the point which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] makes. Unless my memory fails me very much, the petition clearly sets forth that he is held by the judgment of the House that he is in contempt for refusing to answer questions propounded to him by the Committee on Ways and Means and by order of the House. And it winds up by stating that he is to be so held, because he is adjudged in contempt, "to the end"—that is the phraseology of the petition—"to the end that proceedings may be instituted against him before the District court on indictment." But the petition sets forth clearly that he is held under the judgment of this House for contempt, because he refused to answer certain questions.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the Sergeant-at-Arms, in his return, did not disclose the whole record of our action here by which this witness is held in his custody?

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman a copy of the return?

Mr. DAWES. And besides the petition, the return itself brings the whole matter before the court, and the court refused to accept the return unless it was accompanied by the body of the witness.

Mr. MAYNARD. In connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to a case that occurred in his own State a great many years ago, in connection with the investigation instituted by the Senate concerning the John Brown raid at Harper's Ferry. Some witnesses were arrested in that State by order of the Senate, and there were proceedings by habeas corpus had. The gentleman is more familiar with that case than I am, and he can tell us whether it throws any light on this question and to what extent.

Mr. DAWES. I would not from memory attempt to state what was the decision in that case. I would like to hear from my colleague, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who I think was upon the bench at the time, if I am not mistaken. He would be more able than I am to tell what were the facts in that case.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think there was nothing in that case that touches the question we are now considering. The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate in that case had employed a parcel of fellows to catch these men wherever they could find them. And the writ of habeas corpus, which I myself issued, was sustained on the ground that the prisoner was not in the custody of the Senate, that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate could not depute his authority. That was the whole point of that case, and does not touch this case at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. Did the inquiry of the court on that occasion extend to the question of the authority of either House of Congress?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It had no occasion to do so. The question was decided on the ground that the man who was professing to hold the party in custody had no lawful authority from the Senate of the United States, not being their officer.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether precisely this question was not decided not very long ago by a circuit judge of this District; whether the judge did not expressly decide in a case precisely similar to this that the court had no jurisdiction to interfere with a commitment by the House for contempt?

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Ways and Means understand that substantially such a decision has been made by another judge of the supreme court of this District. A writ of habeas corpus, as we understand, was obtained in that case; but when the return disclosed the ground upon which the party was held—which was the order of the House precisely as it is in this case—the writ was dismissed instanter, and the attorney who had applied for the writ received the reprimand of the court for omitting to make that fact known when he applied for the writ. In that case the body was not brought before the court.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise a question of order. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has permitted the discussion to proceed, although no formal proposition has been submitted to the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. As no motion is pending, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] allow me to submit a motion?

Mr. DAWES. I desire first to submit the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to further debate, unless there is some proposition pending.

Mr. DAWES. Let the proposition of the gentleman from New York be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the communication of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report thereon with all practicable dispatch; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed not to produce the body of Richard B. Irwin before any court, officer, or tribunal until the further order of this House.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to offer a substitute for that.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] by striking out the last clause.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor, I believe. I simply yielded to have the motion of the gentleman from New York read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to amend that motion.

The SPEAKER. It is not pending. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] did not allow it to be offered, but simply to be read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to give notice of an amendment, to refer the subject to a special committee of five.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask the Chair how the gentleman from Massachusetts can have the floor unless there is a question pending?

The SPEAKER. The communication of the Sergeant-at-Arms itself affords a basis of discussion. There might be some motion made in regard to it; as, for instance, to refer it to a committee, with or without instructions. But the Chair thinks the discussion is proceeding in a very natural manner upon the question, and that the House, prior to the discussion, need not be forced to a particular line of policy.

Mr. DAWES. In my previous remarks I alluded to the case of Nugent, decided in 1848 in the circuit court of this District. I had not then the book at hand; I have since obtained it, and I now read the head-note:

1. Every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts; and in case of commitment for contempt in such case, no other court can have a right to inquire directly into the correctness or propriety of the commitment, or to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus.

2. The warrant of commitment need not set forth the particular facts which constitute the alleged contempt.

3. The Senate of the United States has power to punish for contempts of its authority in cases of which it has jurisdiction; and an inquiry whether any person, and who, had violated the rule of the Senate which requires that all treaties laid before them should be kept secret until the Senate should take off the injunction of secrecy, is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

4. The Senate of the United States has a right to hold secret sessions whenever in its judgment the proceedings shall require secrecy, and may pronounce judgment in secret session for a contempt which took place in secret session.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, when the subject of the imprisonment of Mr. Irwin was before the House a short time ago, I presented some views upon it without having had time to look into any book. Within the last half hour I have very hastily examined a few books on the subject, and I think the matter now before us is of enough importance to justify the presentation of some views and of some authorities in support of them.

It will be seen at once that the paper submitted to the House on behalf of the Sergeant-at-Arms presents questions of the utmost importance. It is a matter of very great moment to this House whether, when it directs that a contumacious witness shall be imprisoned for contempt, the authority of the House can be set aside on habeas corpus by a police judge of this city. If so, we shall be completely at the mercy of the judicial authority thus invoked. It seems to me that in some sense this House is a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and that its determination can no more be inquired into by a police judge than the determinations of such a judge can be inquired into by this House.

A MEMBER. Judge MacArthur is not a police judge.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That makes no difference. The police court, I believe, has the right to issue a writ of habeas corpus. It amounts to the same thing. I understood the writ of habeas corpus was issued by the police court, but in that it seems I am mistaken. But I do not mean to say anything disrespectful of any judicial officer of the District, for I have profound respect for and entire confidence in them all. No man can have more sincere respect for the judicial office than I have.

This paper presents two questions: First, as to the power of the House to punish for contempt; and, secondly, as to the power of the court over the Sergeant-at-Arms and the persons who may be imprisoned by our order. Upon the power of the House to punish for contempt I want to read an authority, for if we have the undoubted power to punish for contempt, it is a very grave question whether that power is not final and conclusive, and whether it can be inquired into by any other authority. The court and this House are co-ordinate branches of, or co-ordinate powers in, the Government.

The power of this House to punish for contempt is undoubted. It is no longer an open question.

Upon this question let me read what is said by a writer of great merit. Judge Hurd, in his work on Habeas Corpus, says:

The right of punishment for contempts by summary conviction is inherent in all courts of justice and essential to their protection and existence. A commitment under such conviction is a commitment in execution, and the judgment of conviction is not subject to review in any other court unless specially authorized by statute. It cannot be attacked under the writ of habeas corpus, except for such gross defects as render the proceeding void. (Hurd on Habeas Corpus, 412.)

The case of Holman vs. Mayor, &c., 26 Texas, 672, is a well-considered case on the same subject. Judge Hurd has collected and cited the cases which sustain the text of his work. The right of punishment for contempt "cannot be attacked under the writ of habeas corpus, except for such gross defects as render the proceeding void," says Judge Hurd. This refers to the power of courts to punish for contempts—the power at common law. But the power of legislative bodies to punish for contempts is equally well supported by authority.

I will refer to the recent valuable work of Judge Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, where this doctrine is held as to the power of legislative bodies to punish for contempt. On page 133 of his work it is said:

Each house may punish contempts of its authority by other persons, without express authority from the Constitution. (Anderson vs. Dunn, 6 Wheaton, 204; Burdett vs. Abbott, 14 East, 1; Stockdale vs. Hansard, 9 Adolphus and Ellis, 231; Burnham vs. Morissey, 14 Gray, 226; Slate vs. Matthews, 37 New Hampshire, 450.) But where imprisonment is imposed as a punishment, it must terminate with the final adjournment of the house; and if the prisoner be not then discharged by its order, he may be released on habeas corpus. (Jefferson's Manual, section 18; Prichard's case, 1 Levine, 165, in king's bench, 12 Charles II.)

I also refer to speaker of Legislative Assembly of Victoria vs. Glass, 3 Privy Council Appeal, 560, (1871,) and Doyle vs. Falconer, 1 Privy Council Appeals, 328.

These are well-considered cases, which affirm the power of legislative assemblies to punish for contempt.

Assuming then that this House has power to punish for contempt, the next question is whether a court has power to review the determination it may make. Upon that question I have an authority which, although it does not meet the question squarely and fully, yet is somewhat pertinent to the inquiry. It is the case of Hess vs. Bartlett, 3 Gray, 468. It is a Massachusetts case, argued in 1855, by my able and learned friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and it was from his argument in that case possibly that he has learned some of the law—erroneous law, as I believe it to be—which he gave to the House the other day in his very able and powerful speech, but which I thought wrong in its legal conclusions.

Mr. CESSNA. I wish to notify the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to whom he alludes is not now present.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I supposed he was in the House; but whatever I say will appear in the RECORD and will be open to review. I know my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will take no exception to the manner of what I say, even if he cannot agree with its matter. It is eminently proper that this whole subject should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the gentleman from Massachusetts will then have full opportunity to express his views upon it. I am in favor of sending it to the Judiciary Committee or to some proper committee to consider. I do not feel any doubt myself as to the proper course to be pursued by the Sergeant-at-Arms, but I am willing that so grave a subject shall have the careful consideration of a committee. And now allow me to present some authority on this question.

In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, page 133, it is said:

> Independently of parliamentary customs and usages, our legislative houses have the power to protect themselves by the punishment and expulsion of a member, "and the courts cannot inquire into the justice of the decision, or even so much as examine the proceedings to see whether opportunity for defense was furnished or not.

In support of this he cites Hess vs. Bartlett, 3 Gray, 468.

This was a habeas corpus case, argued by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in 1855, for the relator.

Hess was arrested by a creditor and imprisoned for debt. He claimed a discharge on habeas corpus on the ground that he was a member of the Legislature, and that as such he was exempt from arrest. The jailer answered that Hess had been expelled from the Legislature. Shaw, C. J., said:

> This case arises upon the privilege of a representative to be exempted from arrest on mesne process, going to, returning from, or attending the General Court, (Legislature.) (Constitution of Massachusetts, chapter 1, section 3, article 10.) Can this be inquired into by habeas corpus? I think it can. It is a question of personal privilege, not of the privilege of the house. If it were, it might be more questionable. (Wilkes's Case, 19 Howell's State Trials, 981; Holiday vs. Pitt, 2 Strange, 985.) The question is whether the house have the power to expel.

I know this does not decide the precise question as to whether the Sergeant-at-Arms is bound by law to produce the body of Irwin, but it is a clear intimation that a judicial court cannot on habeas corpus inquire into a question involving "the privilege of the House." The moment it is made to appear by a return to a writ of habeas corpus and by the record of this House that Irwin is imprisoned for contempt in a matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the House, that moment the writ falls and the jurisdiction of the judicial court ceases. Hurd, in his work on Habeas Corpus, quotes an authority as follows:

> Although the body of the prisoner is usually returned with the writ, the reasons of the prisoner's detention are, however, sometimes returned without actually bringing up the applicant; as where he is charged with treason or felony, clearly expressed in the warrant of commitment, or imprisoned for any civil cause of action, or in execution. (10 Pet. C. L., 199, n.)

It makes no difference that Hurd refers to imprisonment by sentence or judgment of a court. It is the fact of legal imprisonment by an authorized sentence that excuses the production of the body of the applicant in habeas corpus. Irwin is now imprisoned by a competent tribunal in a matter within its jurisdiction. He has had his "day in court," his hearing in this House, and he is now, in the language of the book I have read, "imprisoned in execution." All this, shown by the record, is all the court can require; and when this is shown by proper return to the habeas corpus, the jurisdiction of the court is at an end.

The book I have read, it seems to me, is very strong evidence of what the law is in this case, but in my judgment it is eminently proper it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that it can be fully discussed, and I am willing to concur in that disposition of it.

During the rebellion, where persons were held in custody of military officers as prisoners of war or for other cause, over which the military authority had undoubted jurisdiction during flagrant war and on the theater of warlike operations, even where battles were not being fought, it was a sufficient return to a habeas corpus to show these facts without the production of the body of the applicant. The courts so held, and their determinations make law. One court cannot on habeas corpus take from another of competent jurisdiction a party on trial, under arrest, or imprisoned for contempt. One court cannot defeat or interrupt the proceedings or process of another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

The habeas corpus statute has no reference to a case like this of Irwin. A similar statute was in force during the war, but it was not held to apply to arrests by competent military power in proper cases for such arrests. There are classes of cases, as this debate has shown, where the production of the body is not required, because when held by other competent power this defeats the jurisdiction in habeas corpus. The Government is never included in a statute unless expressly named, so the law-books say. And for the same reason this House is not included in the habeas corpus statute. It is not to be presumed that Congress lacks a power essential to the ends of justice and necessary for its own protection. The statute does not apply, because no court can have jurisdiction to revise a sentence of the House. It can only apply to cases of proper jurisdiction.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not wish to quote authorities, although I have some before me. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has partly anticipated one or two points which I desired to make. I do not see so much complication in this case as some other gentlemen. If the Sergeant-at-Arms should make answer to the court that he held this man under full authority of the House of Representatives in proceedings against the prisoner for contempt, I would hold that to be the end of the responsibility of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He is not required to say anything further to that court, and the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms, both and all, may properly deny any further jurisdiction whatever to the court in the case. Of course there is not precisely involved the power of the House to punish for contempt; for it is not to be supposed that any judge for a moment would deny that. I do not know, therefore, precisely what is the difficulty of the case. If it is because the Sergeant-at-Arms has not proffered to the court a proper reply, then let him make a proper reply and offer it without the body of this person.

Some one will say, why not offer this answer with the body of the person in question? For this reason, that the court may—I do not know and I do not wish to be made certain of the matter one way or the other in advance—the court may, for aught I know, decide that the answer having been made and the body having been produced with the answer, the court will take that body and hold it according to its discretion. Should the court take that course, the result might be the discharge of this prisoner and his escape from the control of the House in a matter perfectly within its jurisdiction. We are not required to run any risk whatever. Our simple reply to the court is that we hold that man under our unquestioned power to punish for contempt. I do not care how brief or decisive the answer may be, for this House in this matter is a court of superior jurisdiction and is not required to enter into all the details. It is not required to plead specifically and in detail, one after the other, the resolutions of instruction to the Committee on Ways and Means and the orders given the Sergeant. The simple declaration that we hold this man under our authority to punish him for contempt is enough.

So far as that is concerned the question was most fully argued in an English case. The sergeant-at-arms of the House of Commons arrested a witness under the warrant of the speaker for refusing to come and testify before the House of Commons. It was held that the superior court, as the House of Commons was, was not under obligations to go into all the details in regard to it; but the plain statement that the man was so held was a sufficient answer.

As one of the limitations of the writ of habeas corpus, the "limitation resulting from the superior rights of other acting judicial tribunals" is thus stated in Hurd on Habeas Corpus, with many authorities to sustain the proposition:

> It is a rule essential to the efficient administration of justice that where a court is vested with jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon which it assumes to act, and regularly obtains jurisdiction of the person, it becomes its right and duty to determine every question which may arise in the cause, without interference from any other tribunal.

Some of my legal friends better acquainted with the law than I am will no doubt follow up this point. I am opposed to any further answer in this case as at present advised than that we hold the man under our undoubted power to punish for contempt. It should be borne in mind that this is a matter involving not this particular case alone, but involving seriously a right of this House deemed essential to their very existence by all legislative bodies.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman allow me, in pursuance of his suggestion, to offer an amendment?

Mr. DAWES. Not now. I yield to my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make a statement of the case, not an argument, in such a way as to avoid a great deal of unnecessary debate. Many of the observations which have been submitted relate to a state of facts which are not in this case. The difficulty, I apprehend, with the committee—I only speak, however, for myself—is that this proceeding is so specifically regulated by a statute of the United States. The statute regulates proceedings of habeas corpus without eliminating from its provisions either House of Congress. The writ may issue, it is provided in section 753 of the Revised Statutes, where the prisoner is in jail—

> Where he is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States.

We assume that this witness is in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms "under or by color of the authority of the United States." If that be admitted, then we ascertain what the next step is under the statute. Section 755 reads:

> The court or justice or judge to whom such application is made shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it appears from the petition itself that the party is not entitled thereto.

Who is to judge whether under that application the writ should be awarded? It seems to me that the court must judge whether the application is sufficient for awarding the writ. And if that be also conceded, then the judge may issue the writ when the witness is in custody under authority or by color of the authority of the United States. And if it be further conceded that the order of the House of Representatives is of that color and the writ issues, then what is to be done? The next section provides that—

The person to whom the writ is directed shall certify to the court or justice or judge before whom it is returnable the true cause of the detention of such party.

There, then, is a duty prescribed to the Sergeant-at-Arms when the writ shall have been issued in accordance with the preceding section. Now, what is the next step? Section 758 says:

The person making the return shall at the same time bring the body of the party before the judge who granted the writ.

There you will observe that the statute of the United States says that if the return is made it shall be accompanied at the same time by the body of the witness. Now, if the judge is satisfied upon the facts that he ought to issue the writ, we cannot, I submit, make an issue with the judge except upon the ground that the judge has not the case properly before him. If these assumptions are correct, then in point of fact the return in this case was made to the court sworn to by the Sergeant-at-Arms, but the court declined to receive it because the body of the witness did not accompany the return. In that situation gentlemen will not fail to observe that the right of this body to punish for contempt is not involved. We are not advised that anybody disputes it or disputes the right of the House to hold this witness in custody. I submit that the only question before the House is, Have we the right under the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States which I have read to prevent our Sergeant-at-Arms, by our order, from obeying the order of the court under the writ which the judge has issued?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Has the gentleman considered the question whether any statute can control the power of the House in this matter?

Mr. KASSON. I have considered that question, and I apprehend that the mode in which the power of this House may be exercised is subject to regulation by statute under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The question I desire to ask is by way of suggestion. I understood the gentleman to have put a question to the House as to whether the power of this House can or ought to be resisted by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. KASSON. No; whether the power of the court ought to be resisted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does not the question go to this extent: whether one House of Congress can set itself up and is in fact above the law and above the action of the whole Congress and the Executive of this Government? Is it not a question in fact whether the House can resist the law of the land?

Mr. KASSON. I have only stated the question as simply as possible, because I regard it as one arising directly under this statute which has been quoted; and so far as my own opinion is worth anything, I cannot but think that the statute intends in all cases arising upon arrests made under authority of the United States, or under color of the authority of the United States, to submit the question in the first instance to the judge whether the writ should issue; then, the writ having issued, the statute is specific that the body must accompany the return, and there is the point we are now discussing.

Now, to give a point to what I have said, I will state in the form of a resolution, without submitting it, what I think is within our power. It will be remembered that the case reported in 12 Wallace was the case of an action against a sheriff for the escape of a prisoner after he had produced the body. An attempt was made to make the sheriff liable in damages for that escape. The court there decided that he was not liable, because, having produced the body in court on writ of habeas corpus, the court had custody and not he, and that the court alone was responsible for that custody. Now, suppose this judge, the body being produced under the statute, should make an order for the custody of the body and in the mean time the witness should escape; who would be responsible? To avoid that difficulty and at the same time to assert the right of the House to the continuance of the custody of this party, and to give the Sergeant-at-Arms the right to obey the law, I suggest this resolution:

Resolved, That pending the proceedings on the writ of habeas corpus, the Sergeant-at-Arms is instructed to retain the person of the party in contempt in his custody.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman consider that that would perhaps be a violation of the law in regard to the production of the body of this party?

Mr. KASSON. No; it is no violation of the law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Taken in connection with the decision to which the gentleman has referred, that a sheriff or sergeant-at-arms is not liable for the escape of a prisoner while ad interim in his custody, although properly in the hands of the court or judge——

Mr. KASSON. I understand the gentleman's point.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Allow me to finish my statement. Does not that imply at all events that during that period of time he, by virtue of law, is subject to the control of the court, and the court has a right to determine what shall be done with him under the circumstances? This is a proposition to decide beforehand that the court will not properly execute its duties as required by law and take proper charge of the prisoner. We have a right to assume that if he ought properly to be returned to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, he will be so returned. Why should we put the House in the position of resisting the law and overriding the judgment of the court?

Mr. KASSON. I will answer the gentleman and should have answered him long ago, for the point of his question is not new, it has been raised before, that until the court makes the order somebody must have custody of the witness. The court has no power to make an order on our Sergeant-at-Arms, for he is not an officer of the court. If he were, and therefore under the jurisdiction of the court, he would be all right. But he cannot give an order to our Sergeant-at-Arms at all. Consequently, if he neglects to make any order to an officer whom he has the right to control, then under that decision the witness would be free from any control.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it not the presumption that the judge would do his duty? The objection I made to the resolution suggested by the gentleman is that we are asked in advance to prejudge the action of the court, and to go upon the presumption that the judge will not take proper care that the prisoner is secured and held until his decision upon the writ.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that we have a precedent where the court did neglect it, and the prisoner escaped. I desire again to call the attention of the House to this statement of the case, in order that the argument might be confined to what we ought to do under the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. My attention was called to this case early in the session of to-day, and I was present during a very considerable discussion of it in the committee-room during the session of the House. I will not state what action the committee took upon the subject; but I will say that enough was said to make a very decided impression upon my mind in regard to the case.

It may have been that this writ was improperly issued; it may be that upon the application for the writ, had an argument in demurrer been made and the facts set out in the case, it would have been the duty of the court to refuse to grant it. But there seems to have been no resistance and no one appeared in reply to the petition at that point of the case, and the writ issued as a matter of course. An effort has been made in the court to have the writ quashed and the proceedings dismissed, because the facts set forth in the petition did not sufficiently warrant the court in issuing its writ. But that has been overruled, I understand, and the court insists upon the production of the body along with the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the writ.

Now, I am not prepared to prejudge the case in advance of what the judge may decide. It is perfectly clear that the court cannot properly discharge the witness if it shall appear upon the return made by the Sergeant-at-Arms that he is imprisoned upon the order of this House for a contempt of the authority of this House. But his petition alleges that he is erroneously imprisoned under a pretense in regard to the authority of this House.

The case, therefore, having reached this point without the interference of this House or any interference of counsel on behalf of the Sergeant-at-Arms, I think the fair way is to allow the proceedings to take their course, to let the returns be made, the prisoner be produced in court, and the whole matter examined. If then the judge holding proceedings in the case shall outrageously, erroneously, or in any other way dispose of the case in a way which we may think is against the law and in defiance of the authority of the House, or in contempt of it, it will be competent for us to deal with that judge and to rearrest the prisoner and so hedge about the case that he will not be interfered with subsequently.

I think, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin before me, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] that it is bad taste to anticipate what the court may decide. On the contrary, I am disposed to take it for granted that the court will decide according to law. If it shall not do so, then it will be time for us to decide what ought to be done.

I wish to remark still further in this connection that I have from the first been in favor of the most rigorous treatment of this prisoner since he has been adjudged in contempt of the authority of the House. I am prepared to keep up that rigorous treatment and to deal with him until he will testify in regard to the matter about which he has been examined. But my desire to deal with him rigorously will not induce me to take proceedings here to obstruct what I think is the natural and regular course of the law.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would like to inquire of the Chair if there is any question pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to yield to allow a proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to be read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman also allowed a proposition of the "gentleman from New York" [Mr. HALE] to be read.

Mr. DAWES. I believe I have the floor.

In order that there may be something before the House, I will move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed in his return to the writ of habeas corpus to bring the body of Richard B. Irwin into court and to set forth as a part of his return that he retains him in custody by order of the House pending the hearing of the writ of habeas corpus.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If that motion shall be submitted, I desire to move as a substitute what I have had read.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] should not call the previous question on his motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to have read a substitute which I desire to offer for his resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms, taking with him the body of the said Irwin, shall nevertheless retain said Irwin and continue to hold him subject to the order of the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the motion of my colleague [Mr. DAWES] by striking out all after the word "contempt."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus; and

An act (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House was, by unanimous consent, granted to Mr. ROSS in the case of Captain Frank Bett; to Mr. COX in the case of Mr. Callahan; and to Mr. SHELDON in the case of E. E. Saunders, of Louisiana.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS—RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Mr. DAWES. I have reduced my proposition to writing, and send it to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to return on the writ of habeas corpus that he brings with him into court the said Richard B. Irwin, and by the order of the House of Representatives retains the said Irwin in his custody pending the hearing upon the said writ.

Mr. HALE, of New York. As a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I offer the motion which has already been read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yield to the gentleman from New York for this purpose?

Mr. DAWES. Not just at this moment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask that my motion may be again read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the communication of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the subject matter thereof be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon with all practicable dispatch; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed not to produce the body of Richard B. Irwin before any court, officer, or tribunal until the further order of this House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I deprecate the discussion that has been precipitated here upon this subject. The questions involved are of too grave a character in both aspects—as involving the rights and liberties of the citizen and as involving the rights and privileges of this House—to be made the subject of a hasty, passionate, extemporaneous discussion here. For one I protest against such a discussion as inconsistent with the dignity of the subject and the dignity of the body which is dealing with it. The questions involved here are not new questions; they are not questions of to-day; they have been before the British Parliament and the British courts for more than three hundred years. It is of the highest importance that they shall be here settled finally and definitely, so far as concerns this body and the rights of citizens of the United States. Such a settlement can only be had by a fair and deliberate investigation before a committee.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the questions pending here are of too much importance to be determined amid such confusion as prevails in this House.

Mr. DAWES. I accept as a substitute for my resolution the proposition offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, have I lost the floor? I supposed that I was in the midst of what little I had to say.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not intend to take the gentleman off the floor. I wanted to hear what he had to say on this subject, and I raised the point of order that there was so much confusion we could not hear.

The SPEAKER. The confusion is made entirely by members of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Well, then, it is against members of the House that my point is raised.

The SPEAKER. Especially those in the aisles, not in their seats.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, my proposition is simply this: that the Judiciary Committee of this House, the committee specially charged with the disposition of legal questions, shall be charged with the consideration of this grave subject; that they shall give it their earliest attention, and shall report upon it to the House; upon which report we can act understandingly.

I was going to say that I would not agree my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was entirely right in his proposition. Certainly I cannot agree with the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the statute disposed of this subject beyond question. As I understand, the statute of 1867 does not change the law in any respect in regard to the point upon which the gentleman was speaking. That has been the law of habeas corpus ever since the writ existed, that the body shall be produced. Therefore I say, do not let us pursue this discussion when there is such wide difference of opinion among members, but let us send it to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the House is not satisfied to send it to that committee, then let us send it to some other committee. I named that as the one which I considered the appropriate committee. I ask that my motion may be received and voted on.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield to the gentleman from New York to offer his proposition as a substitute for mine. Then the two will be before the House and it can take whichever it pleases.

Mr. TREMAIN. The gentleman yields to me to offer my proposition as a substitute for his.

Mr. BECK. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this question. Reference has been made to the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means was called upon to consider it. I think that committee acted wisely in laying the whole matter before the House for its consideration and action. I do not regard it as a question merely involving Richard B. Irwin, or any other individual man. The question is, what will this House do in all cases of contempt? It may involve me to-morrow or any other gentleman upon this floor the next day, if you please; and for words spoken here which we thought we had a right to speak any of us may be ordered to jail by the authority of this House. The award of the writ of habeas corpus is the appeal of the citizen from the power which imprisons him, and it ought not to be taken away except for good substantial reasons. We have a law upon the subject. It is brief but pointed. Section 755 of the Revised Statutes declares:

The court or justice or judge to whom such application is made shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it appears from the petition itself that the party is not entitled thereto.

The judge has decided in this case, I understand, that it does not appear upon the face of the petition itself the party applying is not entitled to the writ of habeas corpus.

Section 755 concludes in these words:

The writ shall be directed to the person in whose custody the party is detained.

Section 758 of the same Revised Statutes provides that—

The persons making the return shall at the same time bring the body of the party before the judge who granted the writ.

That is the law passed by Congress and approved by the President; and I deny the power of this House to set it aside by its individual action. If the law is that the party making the return shall bring the body of the prisoner before the court, this House, acting independently of the Senate and of the Executive, ought not to assume the high prerogative of disobeying the law when it has joined in passing the law providing that the body of the prisoner shall be produced in court as part of the return to the writ.

Mr. Speaker, the great question which has agitated all freemen for the last eight hundred years, is whether any body on earth has the power to imprison a man and deny to him the right to apply to the court for a writ of habeas corpus. This man has applied to one of the courts of this District. He had the right to apply to the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal in the land. If he had done so, would it have been said by this House, when it had decided in accordance with the law of the land that the face of the petition did not disclose the fact he was not entitled to the writ and therefore granted it, that the Sergeant-at-Arms should not produce his body? Shall we say that this is only a little inferior court to which no respect should be accorded? I think not.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman whether, in his judgment, the statute of 1867 has in any respect changed the law—whether the law has not always been the same since the existence of the writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. BECK. It has always been the law. It is the leading provision in the old bill of rights. It has been the right of the citizen to demand the writ of habeas corpus since the time of Charles II. Indeed, it is a part of Magna Charta itself.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BECK. If you do anything, take hold of the judge who issued the writ and bring him to the bar of the House, as he is the only one who, in this regard, is in contempt. The citizen has the right to apply for the writ. Take the judge, then, who issued the writ and bring him to the bar of the House for illegally issuing the writ in contempt of our rights and privileges to punish for contempts, but do not order your Sergeant-at-Arms to disobey the law by not producing the body of the prisoner.

If there is any contempt offered to our rights or our authority, it has been committed by the judge who issued that writ. Bring him to the bar. That is the way to test the question. There is your remedy. But do not disobey the law of the land, putting yourselves in contempt of the law you passed. Every citizen has the right to apply for the writ. The wrong is done by the hand that illegally grants it, if wrong is done.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a minute?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question before he resumes his seat. I ask him this question if he will be gracious enough to hear me: He concedes that the statute of 1867 has not changed the law of habeas corpus; that that has always been the law. Now is the gentleman not aware that the Supreme Court of the United States has twice within the last twenty years—in the case of Abelman vs. Booth, 21 Howard, and Tarble's case, 13 Wallace—adjudged that under certain circumstances it was the duty of the officer of the United States not to bring the body of the prisoner pursuant to the exigency of the writ, but to make return of the fact that he held him by a paramount authority inconsistent with such production of the body. Does he forget that that has been the law as laid down by the highest tribunal in this land when he makes his furious declamation as to this House overriding the law?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] allows me to answer the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] In those cases it was because of the fact that there was a different jurisdiction.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Precisely.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Here is a case where a court of the United States by virtue of its writ of habeas corpus, the highest writ of liberty against oppression, has to inquire into the action of the United States authority. It is not a question of paramount authority. It is not a conflict of jurisdiction. But here is a question of illegal imprisonment, and the inquiry is whether this man is illegally imprisoned by authority of the United States, if you please; and it does not involve the question decided in either of the cases to which the gentleman has alluded.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is conceded, then, that there is an exception to the doctrine that the exigency of the writ must be obeyed. Now I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that if he will examine the British authorities he will find that an utter exemption of the process of the Legislature or of either body of the Legislature has been distinctly recognized.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is because of the omnipotence of Parliament, an attribute which the Congress of the United States never possessed.

Mr. TREMAIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yields to me to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to make a return to the writ of habeas corpus showing in proper form that he holds the prisoner in custody under the order of this House adjudging him guilty of contempt, and that he be further instructed not to bring the body of the prisoner before the court until otherwise ordered by this House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for that amendment?

Mr. DAWES. I do, that it may be considered as pending.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire to say a few words. My colleague from New York [Mr. HALE] has anticipated what I was about to say in regard to the authority of the writ of habeas corpus. When in the State of Wisconsin a prisoner was held under the old fugitive-slave law and a writ of habeas corpus was issued for the purpose of obtaining his discharge, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision delivered by the late Chief Justice Taney, held that it was the duty of the officer holding the prisoner to make a return of the fact that he held him under the provisions of the fugitive-slave law, and then to refuse to bring him before the person issuing the writ. In a most thorough and elaborate discussion of the subject the learned judge holds that it would be the duty of the officer to protect his custody of the slave by all the power of the Government.

During the late war there were repeated cases arising in the State of New York, that will be found reported in our books, where, upon a habeas corpus seeking to obtain the discharge of a person, say, a soldier held as an alleged traitor or for some other alleged offense committed against the United States, the officer acting under the instructions of his superiors returned simply to the writ of habeas corpus that he held him under that authority, and refused in every instance to bring the body before the officer issuing the writ.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Under military authority.

Mr. TREMAIN. Now, I undertake to say in regard to the proceeding for contempt, the law is just as well settled that, where a court or a proper tribunal adjudges a party guilty of contempt, there is no power under a habeas corpus to inquire into the merits of the judgment so holding him in contempt. It is a well settled principle, to be found in most of the statutes and in all the rules of court on habeas corpus, that a court cannot by virtue of a habeas corpus inquire into the merits of the contempt.

What, then, is the effect of adopting the resolution that is offered? It is that the body of this party must be taken there; and when you take him there, then, under the decision in 12 Wallace, the court has jurisdiction over him. You surrender him to the judge.

Mr. DAWES. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from New York, but I will give him authority from Blackstone. Mr. Justice Blackstone, as quoted in the Nugent case, says:

I concur in opinion that we cannot discharge the lord mayor. The present case is of great importance, because the liberty of the subject is materially concerned. The House of Commons is a supreme court, and they are judges of their own privileges and contempts, more especially with respect to their own members. Here is a member committed in execution by the judgment of his own house. All courts, by which I mean to include the two houses of Parliament and the courts of Westminster Hall, are uncontrolled in matters of contempt. The sole adjudication of contempts, and the punishment thereof in any manner, belongs exclusively and without interfering to each respective court. Infinite confusion and disorder would follow if courts could by writ of habeas corpus examine and determine the contempts of others. This power to commit results from the first principles of justice, for if they have power to decide they ought to have power to punish; no other court shall scan the judgment of a superior court or the principal seat of justice. As I said before, it would occasion the utmost confusion if every court of this hall should have power to examine the commitments of the other courts of the hall for contempt; so that the judgment and commitment of each respective court as to contempts must be final and without control.

This case was decided in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, May, 1848, and reported in 8th Philadelphia American Law Journal, p. 107.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is the doctrine. You cannot, under a writ of habeas corpus, inquire into the validity of the judgment of a body having authority and which has ordered the party into custody, and therefore it is that that statute passed in 1867 in reference to a party held under the authority of the United States has no application whatever to a case where the party is held under the authority of a supreme court holding that party guilty of contempt against its privileges. It is not a case where the party is held by the authority of the United States. He is held by the paramount, supreme authority of the highest legislative body in the country adjudging him guilty of contempt.

Now, if you take the witness to the court under this resolution, then under the authority which has been cited from 12 Wallace you place him at the judge's order, give him into the custody of the court, and the judge can order a posse comitatus to enforce his order in reference to that custody. And for what purpose do you take the prisoner there? It is entirely inconsistent with your action here. I propose that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall make a respectful return to the writ of the court, and shall not take the body there unless the House so orders. If hereafter we find any reason because of the action of this judge for permitting the body to be taken before the court, it will be time enough to act upon the matter then. But I hope the House will not neutralize its own action by permitting the body to be taken before the court. I propose, therefore, that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall make a respectful return to the court, setting forth the acts and proceedings of the House, and when the judge has decided upon that it will be time enough for us to decide whether or not we will allow the body to be taken before the court.

Mr. DAWES. The three propositions now pending I think cover all the propositions on which the House should vote, and I therefore call the previous question.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield to my colleague.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, if the House of Representatives in passing upon this question acts itself in a judicial capacity, how does the question differ from this case: If I were a judge and were sitting in a court and a man were on trial before me for murder, and some other court under the same jurisdiction, we will suppose, should issue a writ of habeas corpus to bring him before that tribunal to decide upon the legality of my action and of my holding him, I think I should instruct the officers of my court to respectfully inform that other tribunal that I had occasion to keep him for the present, and that I should not suspend proceedings in order to send him to the other tribunal. It seems therefore to be a question whether the House of Representatives is executing a function by which it has the right to the presence of this man, to hold him for its own examination and its own adjudication upon the necessity of his presence and to decide how long he should be retained in that custody. If we have that authority, it would seem to follow that there could be no adjudication under a writ of habeas corpus by another department of the Government which should undertake to interfere with our action.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, a conflict between two independent and co-ordinate branches of the Government is something that always should be avoided. The Congress of the United States and the judiciary of the United States are independent and co-ordinate departments. It may very well be that this House has the power to hold the person in question absolutely and without any right of review by the judiciary department; but we ought not, it seems to me, to precipitate such a conflict, or to come to any decision upon such a question in a hasty and excited manner.

It is at least, sir, due from courtesy to the court that we adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to return to the court the answer that this person is held by commitment of the House for contempt, that his body is brought before the court in order that such return may be made, but to further instruct the Sergeant-at-Arms to continue his custody until the further orders of the House. And I have no doubt that when that fact is suggested to the court we will be freed from coming into contact with the judicial department of the Government. But if on the contrary the decision of the court should be that we have held this man unlawfully in custody and the court should direct his discharge, then when our officer reports that result back to us we can take such action as the duties and rights of the House require.

Mr. TREMAIN. Suppose that by that time this recusant witness should be on his way to Canada.

Mr. POTTER. The resolution directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to take the prisoner with him in making return to the writ, but nevertheless to continue to hold him in his custody until the further order of the House. The difficulty now is, as I understand the case, that the judge refuses to receive the return without production of the prisoner. But he may be produced and yet still retained in the custody of the House.

Many MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] sent word to me that he would yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. I said if I had the opportunity.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman has the opportunity now.

Mr. BECK. And the gentleman promised to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. I must yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. BECK. I will take but a moment; I have only a word to say. I do not differ from what has been said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] that no court has the right to interfere with us in the punishment we may adjudge for contempt. But what I do say is this, that when a man has sent a petition to the court which the judge has said is sufficient ground for him to issue the writ upon, then the law requires that the person making return of that writ shall at the same time bring the body of the party before the judge who granted the writ. I do not want to violate that law. If, when our Sergeant-at-Arms shall bring the body before this judge, the judge shall in violation of his known duty take him out of our hands and deny our right to hold him in contempt, then I would impeach that judge. But I would not violate the law by withholding the man. I would obey the law, and then impeach the judge who denied the jurisdiction of this House. That is what I would do.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seemed to be assumed in the very outset that we were to cast an imputation upon the judge who issued this writ of habeas corpus. Every proposition here proceeds upon the presumption that this judge did not intend to do his duty in the case.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I know Judge MacArthur very well; he is from the State of Wisconsin, and a purer judge does not live than he.

Mr. TREMAIN. I did not mean any such thing. But all I meant to say was that if we bring the body there we surrender our power; and it is not proper for us to do that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I want to say further that I do not believe this House of Representatives is above the law of the land. I do not believe it has the power or the right to say that a law solemnly passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, and approved by the Executive of this Government, is not to be obeyed by the members of this House as well as by the people of this country. I do not believe any such thing as that. How far the court may go into the question of whether this party has been guilty of contempt or not I do not care; that question may not be involved in the matter.

But the legality of this imprisonment is the question involved in this case. A citizen of the United States appeals to the highest writ of the land that his case may be inquired into. And yet we stand here saying in advance that if the judge shall act upon that contrary to our views we will impeach him. As one of the members of this House I wish to protest against any such doctrine, whether it be after or before the action of the judge. In my judgment Judge MacArthur will act upon this question according to his best judgment and as a pure and upright judge, and I want to give him an opportunity to so act.

I do not believe that a resolution of this House is equal to the law of the land; nor do I believe that we are above the law. If we undertake to imprison a man, to rob him of his liberty, or to murder him, I believe a writ of habeas corpus may arrest that action of this House, and that it ought to do it.

Mr. DAWES. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw my proposition and adopt that of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of the said Irwin before said court when making such return, and retain said Irwin, and continue to hold him subject to the further order of this House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Take the body before the judge, in order to tell him that he cannot have it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] offers as a substitute for the resolution that which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the communication of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon with all practicable dispatch; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed not to produce the body of Richard B. Irwin before any court, officer, or tribunal till the further order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] moves to amend the proposition of his colleague [Mr. HALE] by substituting therefor what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to make return to the writ of habeas corpus showing in proper form that he holds the prisoner in custody under the order of this House adjudging him guilty of contempt; and that he be further instructed not to bring the body of the prisoner before the court until otherwise ordered by this House.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] to the substitute moved by his colleague, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the original proposition by striking out all after the words "proceedings against him for contempt." I think it is in order to perfect the original proposition before the question is taken upon any substitute for it.

The SPEAKER. No further amendment is in order pending the operation of the previous question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I moved that amendment before the previous question was called.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to make a motion which I think is in order. I think the law should be executed; and therefore I move to lay this whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] applied to the original proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] which has been withdrawn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. And I understood it also to apply to the proposition which he accepted.

Mr. DAWES. I offer no objection.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] as modified, by striking out the last clause, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of the said Irwin before said court when making such return, and retain said Irwin and continue to hold him subject to the further order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that the whole subject lie on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think that the law is clear and that the Sergeant-at-Arms should obey it.

Several MEMBERS. No debate.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 16, noes not counted.

The question being then taken on the amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. TREMAIN, which was again read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That proposition states what it is unnecessary to affirm, if true, that we have adjudged Irwin guilty of contempt. Why is it not better, in order to avoid raising questions needlessly, to say merely that he is held under proceedings against him?

Mr. TREMAIN. The first resolution of the House on this subject adjudged him guilty of contempt.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. We are not holding him to punish him.

Mr. TREMAIN. As the original resolution in its present amended form accomplishes substantially the object I had in view, I will withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

The question being taken, the substitute was not agreed to; there being—ayes 62, noes 79.

The question being then taken on the original resolution, as amended, there were—ayes 96, noes 51.

Mr. ELDREDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ASHE: The petition of citizens of Lancaster, South Carolina, for a post-route from Lancaster, South Carolina, to Charlotte, North Carolina, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

W. D. KELLEY providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NESMITH: The petition of citizens of Union County, Oregon, for the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for the establishment of certain post-routes, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for the extinction of the Indian title to the Umatilla reservation, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, that the State be reimbursed for expenses incurred on account of the provisional territorial government, to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation of $30,000 to construct a military wagon-road from some point on Illinois River to Chetco, Curry County, Oregon, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation to construct a wagon-road from Ashland to Hot Springs, in southern Oregon, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, praying Congress to make all future issues of Government bonds taxable, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, asking Congress to place burlaps and jute on the free list, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation to improve Yam Hill River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation to improve Coquille River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation to improve Willamette River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, for an appropriation to improve Nehalim River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Petition of mothers pensioned on account of services of their sons in the Army and Navy, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RANSIER: The petition of citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, for the incorporation of the Eastern and Western Transportation Company, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. SCHELL: Memorial and other papers relating to the case of Townsend Harris, formerly minister to Japan, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of George W. Payne and wife, of Spottsylvania County, Virginia, to be compensated for services rendered a sick soldier of the United States Army and for losses incurred during the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of William Rule, postmaster at Knoxville, Tennessee, for relief, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of Mary McMillan, for relief, and to be placed on the pension-rolls, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 15, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of C. H. Barron & Co., and 16 others, of McGregor, Iowa, praying the passage of the pending bill defining a gross of matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of McGregor, Iowa, asking for the repeal of the tax on friction matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the memorial of Messrs. Campbell, Dowling, Richards, Finlay, McIver, and others, of Charleston, South Carolina, praying the incorporation of the Eastern and Western Transportation Company; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, relative to the Freedman's Savings Bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying Congress to reimburse them for losses sustained by deposits made in the Freedman's Savings Bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to grant the prayer of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company for the indorsement or guarantee of interest on its bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of John J. Murphy, guardian, &c., asking that a pension be granted to the minor heirs of Isaac N. Murphy, a soldier in the First Arkansas Regiment of Infantry in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of L. C. Obarr, late commissary sergeant First Regiment Arkansas Cavalry, asking for the payment of bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Mrs. D. Jay Browne, asking compensation for services of her late husband as agent of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of William Cash, of Princeton, Caldwell County, Kentucky, asking for relief for property taken by the Army during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Victoria C. Woodhull, Tennie C. Claflin, and James H. Blood, praying indemnity for false imprisonment by orders of a United States court; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLY presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Oregon, in favor of Congress granting the right of way to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of Mrs. Hannah Waters, of Horn Island, Mississippi Sound, praying compensation for certain beef-cattle and swine taken from her during the late rebellion for the use of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented a petition of manufacturers of matches, praying that the law imposing a tax on matches be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented a memorial of citizens of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, remonstrating against the proposed organization of a territorial government for the Indian Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN. An adverse report was made by the Committee on Claims during the last session in the case of Frederick A. Holden, praying remuneration for property destroyed in Wayne County, West Virginia. I have some additional papers to present in the case. I ask for an order to withdraw and recommit the papers heretofore reported upon, with these additional papers, to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the Senator whether there was an adverse report?

Mr. BOREMAN. Yes, sir; I stated that fact. This is additional testimony, with an additional statement by the petitioner sworn to.

Mr. SCOTT. Setting out what the additional testimony is?

Mr. BOREMAN. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks that certain papers be withdrawn on which an adverse report has been made, and that the additional testimony in this case, with those papers, be referred to the Committee on Claims. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GILBERT. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Salvador Costa, for a vessel captured and destroyed by the naval forces of the United States, be taken from the Committee on Claims and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the object of that change of reference?

Mr. GILBERT. It is thought the case belongs to the Committee on Naval Affairs rather than to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I will examine that and confer with the Senator from Florida before the order is finally made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SCOTT subsequently said: I have examined the order offered by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. GILBERT] and I find that the petition which he wishes to take from the Committee on Claims and refer to the Committee on Naval Affairs, does not ask to do anything in the Navy or for the Navy; it is simply a demand for the payment of money for a boat taken by officers of the Navy; and while I should be glad to have the assistance of the Naval Committee in disposing of this case, I think it has had the proper reference, and the order ought not to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is whether the order asked by the Senator from Florida shall be adopted.

The order was rejected.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That Eli H. Garrett have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate for use in the Pension Office.

Mr. CONKLING. I have in my hand a letter of John Graham, a citizen of New York, who asks me to move for an order allowing him to withdraw his papers, including a brief and a proposed act touching a claim of his, once referred to the Judiciary Committee, but receiving, as he says, no action there. I move that he have leave to withdraw his papers, copies to be left if it shall turn out that there has been an adverse report.

It was so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOTT. I gave notice yesterday morning that I would call up a motion to which objection was then made to fix Thursday next for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims. I find in the RECORD this morning a notice given by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] that he will on Monday next insist on taking up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and on continuing it until it shall be disposed of. In view of that notice, and knowing how successful my friend from Maine usually is in getting his bills before the Senate, I shall await the disposition of his notice before I again press mine.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 940) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Frank W. Jones, in relation to the fees of attorneys prosecuting claims for pensions, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Brenton Lewis, praying the passage of an act placing him on the pension-roll, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2674) granting a pension to John W. Wright, now at the National Military Asylum near Dayton, Ohio, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California against the passage of the bill now pending for the confirmation of what is known as the "Santillan land grant," to report it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not understand the report.

Mr. STEVENSON. The committee reported in favor of the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. How is the Senate to indefinitely postpone the resolution of a State Legislature?

Mr. STEVENSON. I should have asked that the committee be discharged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all, and then the resolution goes on the files.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to discharging the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposed the proper way to put the question was on discharging the committee rather than on the indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT. There was no resolution of the Senate and no bill for the action of the committee sent to it, but the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. I will not object, but only say that this Santillan claim is a monumental case, in my judgment, of a fraud, and abundant evidence of that fact of a documentary character could be furnished to the committee if an opportunity had been given; and I would have been much gratified if that opportunity had been afforded and the committee had branded it as it deserves. But as the committee ask to be discharged and there is no legislation pending, let it go for the present.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876. As there is but a single amendment it is unnecessary to have this bill reprinted. I give notice that at an early day I will call it up.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

JOHN G. PARR.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to move for the reconsideration and recommitment to the Committee on Pensions of House bill No. 1616, granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Pensions consents that it shall be recommitted for the purpose of examination into an alleged error of fact.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely? The Chair hears none; and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas made an adverse report yesterday from the Committee on Pensions on the bill (H. R. No. 3716) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, and the bill was thereupon indefinitely postponed. With the consent of the Senator from Kansas, I move that the vote be reconsidered and that the bill be put upon the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1132) to establish a branch mint of the United States at Omaha in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1133) for the relief of Charles W. Preddy; which was read twice by its title, and with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1134) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1135) for the relief of Francisco V. De Coster, of Litchfield, Meeker County, Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KELLY (at the request of the Delegate from Idaho) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1136) for the sale of timber land in the Territories; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1137) for the relief of Rosa O. Gantt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1138) for the relief of Henry C. Preuss, administrator of Constantia Reeves; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1139) for the relief of William D. Bibb, of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1140) for the relief of Lucy C. Field; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Claims and printed, and that the papers on file pertaining to the claim of Lucy C. Field be taken from the file and placed in possession of that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1141) to amend an act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1142) to provide for the sale of the Pawnee Indian lands in Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1143) to provide for the sale of a portion of the Fond du Lac Indian reservation in Minnesota, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1144) to prevent cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As that is a penal bill, I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1145) to provide for the sale of desert lands in Lassen County, California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLY. If the morning business is closed, I wish, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to allow me to do so, to call up and make some remarks upon the bill which I gave notice the other day that I would call up, or at least ask the Senate to take it up after the conclusion of the morning business to-day. Inasmuch as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] has the floor at one o'clock and I desire exceedingly to make some remarks upon this bill, I should like to have it called up now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. KELLY. It is Senate bill No. 331, providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator wish to take up this bill for final action to-day?

Mr. KELLY. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the Clerk to read the bill as proposed to be amended. I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate in reading the original bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Railroads report an amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad, extending from a point on the Union Pacific or Central Pacific Railroad not farther east than Ogden nor farther west than Kelton, in the Territory of Utah, to Portland, in the State of Oregon, is hereby declared a military and post-road; and the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company, by its own cars, appropriate for the service and approved by the Postmaster General and with its own rolling-stock, equipment, and management, without fee or reward, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall forever transport the United States mail, Army and Indian supplies, troops and munitions of war of every kind; and shall transmit all dispatches upon its telegraph line for the United States Government free of charge.

SEC. 2. That the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turn-outs, stations, and watering-places; and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling-stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business, with rails of the T or angle iron, and upon the narrow-gauge plan, three feet in width; with a telegraph line, constructed in a substantial manner, to be operated along the line of the said railroad. And the said company shall commence the work on such road within one year from the approval of this act, and complete the same within five years thereafter.

SEC. 3. That in consideration of the services herein agreed to be performed by the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company, the United States guarantee, as hereinafter expressed, the payment of interest, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum in gold coin, payable half-yearly, on the 1st days of January and July in each year, for the period of ten years, upon the construction bonds of said company, to the amount of $8 000 only for each and every mile of the main line of the said railroad, not including side-tracks. And for that purpose, and as evidence thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be indorsed said guarantee of interest on behalf of the United States upon the construction bonds of said corporation to the extent mentioned in this section, for not exceeding in the whole seven hundred miles of single track from its terminal point, as the same shall be established upon the line of the Union Pacific Railroad or the Central Pacific Railroad, as hereinbefore stated, to the city of Portland, its western terminus.

SEC. 4. That whenever and as often as the said corporation shall have completed a section of its road of not less than twenty-five miles, it shall report such fact to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall thereupon cause an examination of the same to be made by three commissioners, to be appointed by him, who shall be paid for their services at the expense of said corporation; and if it shall appear by the report of said commissioners that such section has been completed substantially in accordance with the requirements of this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall report that fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon cause the said guarantee of interest to be indorsed on an amount of the above-described bonds of the said company equal to the said sum of $8,000 per mile on such completed section, and shall deliver the same to the lawful agent, attorney, or representative of said company. The said construction bonds shall be made payable by the said company in the city of New York at a specified time, not more than twenty years from the date thereof, with coupons attached for half-yearly interest, which shall also be made payable in the city of New York. All coupons attached to said bonds so indorsed and delivered, the time for the payment of which shall have elapsed before such delivery, shall be canceled and preserved, and the guarantee of interest on the part of the United States shall only commence with the half-yearly payment next after the indorsement and delivery of the said bonds to the said corporation at the rate aforesaid. No indorsement or delivery of such bonds shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the last two sections of twenty-five miles each of the said main line of railroad until it shall appear from the report of said commissioners that the same shall be completed according to the requirements of this act, and that effectual railroad connection has been made by said company as herein proposed from the Union Pacific or the Central Pacific Railroad to the city of Portland: Provided, however, That if the said company shall first construct those portions of its railroad known as the Portage Links, around the Cascade Falls and the Dalles of the Columbia, and complete the same before any other portion of the said road along the Columbia River, so as to facilitate navigation and lessen the expenses of transporting freight and passengers on said river, then and in that case it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, upon an application of the said company, to cause an examination of the same to be made by the commissioners, as herein provided; and if it shall appear by their report that either of those portions of said road has been completed as required by this act, then the Secretary of the Interior shall report that fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon cause the said guarantee of interest to be indorsed on an amount of the above-described bonds equal to the said sum of $8,000 per mile of completed road over either of said portages, although the portion so constructed may not be equal to a section of twenty-five miles.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the said corporation from issuing and disposing of its bonds in accordance with the powers granted to it by the State of Oregon by an act dated October 15, 1872, or any act amendatory thereof; but all such bonds and the mortgages, trust-deeds, or other securities given to secure the payment thereof shall in all cases be subordinate to the rights and powers herein reserved to the United States. And the services to be rendered by the said railroad and telegraph line for the United States Government shall inhere in and become a part of the corporate existence of the said company; and shall be a lien upon and attach to the said railroad, its roadbed, rolling-stock, and equipments, and to the said telegraph line. And such services shall be performed by the said corporation, its assigns, and successors, whether such transfer or succession be made by voluntary act of said corporation, by act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, by sale under process of any court of competent jurisdiction, or by any other form of legal adjudication whatsoever.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to see that the said bonds be not indorsed and delivered as hereinbefore provided until it shall be made to appear that there are no liens of any kind, by mortgage, trust deed, or otherwise, upon any section of completed road, excepting such as expressly recognize the priority of right in the United States to have the services performed as specified in this act; and the United States shall in no event be liable for any part of the principal of said bonds; and the performance by the corporation of the services stipulated in this act shall be deemed to be a full payment of all claims of the United States for reimbursement of any sums paid as interest as aforesaid; and in case of refusal or failure to perform such services by the said corporation for the period of six months, the said corporation, its successors or assigns, shall forthwith become liable to repay to the United States all sums of money paid by them, after deducting a reasonable compensation for any services actually performed; and the United States shall have power to bring actions or suits in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon against said corporation, its successors or assigns, to enforce such repayment by judgment or decree and execution thereon, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party; and the obligation to perform said services in the future shall, notwithstanding the said judgment, decree, and execution, remain in full force and effect against the said corporation, its successors and assigns.

SEC. 7. That if any officer, agent, or employé of the said corporation, its successors or assigns, shall willfully refuse to transport the United States mails, Army or Indian supplies, troops, or munitions of war over its railroad, or transmit any dispatches over its telegraph line, after the United States shall be entitled to have such services performed as specified in this act, such officer, agent, or employé shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in any United States district court having jurisdiction of the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months.

SEC. 8. That the said company shall not unjustly discriminate in favor of or against any person or corporation in its charges for the transportation of persons or property over the said railroad or dispatches over the said telegraph line; nor in favor of or against any particular town or place on the line of said railroad; nor make any excessive charges or other undue use of the powers and privileges hereby granted to the said company.

SEC. 9. That the said company shall annually report a condensed statement showing its net earnings, 25 per cent. of which, after payment of interest due by the said corporation upon its bonds, shall be immediately invested in United States interest-bearing bonds, and the same shall constitute a sinking fund with which to redeem at maturity the principal of its first-mortgage bonds.

SEC. 10. That the United States make the several conditional grants herein, and the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company accept the same, upon the condition that if the said company make any breach in the conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for one year, in such case the United States may at any time, by Congress, do any and all acts necessary to insure a speedy completion of said railroad.

SEC. 11. That the acceptance of the terms and conditions of this act by the said company shall be signified in writing under its corporate seal, duly executed, pursuant to a vote of its stockholders first had and obtained; which acceptance shall be made within ninety days after the approval of this act, and shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 12. That in order to effectually enforce the rights and privileges specified herein, Congress may at any time add to, alter, or amend this act.

Mr. KELLY. As I said the other day when I notified the Senate that I should ask for the taking up of this bill to-day, I am induced to do so by instructions from the Legislature of the State of Oregon. I then said, and I repeat now, that my colleague and myself have been twice instructed by that body to do what we can to urge the passage of this bill. I would say, further, that the territorial Legislature of Washington Territory have memorialized Congress to the same effect; that the territorial Legislature of Idaho have done the same thing; and resolutions to that effect were presented by me the other day.

This bill was carefully considered by the Committee on Railroads at the last session, and on the 4th day of May reported favorably, accompanied by a report I should like very much, if I had the time, to have read; but I am well aware that the time of the Senate is taken up in discussing matters which perhaps may be deemed more important than this, although to the people of the Pacific Northwest it is of much greater importance than anything that is before this body.

Mr. President, the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, which are embraced in the Columbia Valley, contain two hundred and sixty thousand square miles. To compare that with other divisions of the United States, I will say that in territorial extent that valley is greater than all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, and Indiana combined, greater than all the States I have just named; and yet there is not any railway connection with that vast extent of country. It is a country rich in natural wealth; one of the best wheat-growing countries in the world; unexcelled for stock raising and wool growing; it has forests of excellent timber, mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, and coal in great abundance; and yet, with all these natural advantages, it is almost entirely unsettled, because inaccessible to those who would willingly make it a home.

The census of 1870 shows that in that vast extent of country there were not quite one hundred and thirty thousand inhabitants, not sufficient for a single Representative in Congress, according to the present ratio of representation. The reason may be asked why it is that a country so productive, of such extensive resources, agricultural, mineral, and commercial, with a genial climate, unexcelled by any in the United States for its healthfulness, should remain comparatively uninhabited. I will state the reason why this is so. The early emigrants to Oregon crossed the plains, going in their teams drawn by horses or oxen, from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast, a journey of two thousand miles, requiring six months or more to accomplish it. That is the way it was peopled by the hardy pioneers who first settled in the country. At the present time one way of going there is by railway to Salt Lake Valley and thence by stage-coaches or wagons, a distance of five hundred miles, over the intervening sage-plains, before the principal settlements are reached. Another way of going is by passing over the Union and Central Pacific Railroads to San Francisco, and there taking the ocean steamers to Portland, making a sea-voyage of six hundred miles before arriving at the end of the journey. The only other way is by a tiresome stage-coach ride from the present terminus of the California and Oregon Railroad over a lofty mountain range and rugged road for a distance of three hundred miles.

The easiest way of reaching Oregon, and the one usually traveled, is by rail to San Francisco, and thence by the circuitous sea-voyage to Portland. And yet from Salt Lake Valley to the settled portions of Oregon is not nearly so far as it is to where the sea-voyage begins. From Kelton, in Salt Lake Valley, to San Francisco it is quite as far as it is to Astoria, in Oregon, and I need not add that a voyage on the ocean is regarded with undefined dread by emigrants with their families, who are unaccustomed to traveling by sea. It does seem to me that Congress ought to do something to lessen the difficulties of reaching this great and inviting portion of our country. Hitherto we have not received the beneficial legislation that other States have had to aid in the building of railroads.

In my judgment, what is asked for in this bill will really be more beneficial to the Government than to the company organized to construct this road. That company proposes to carry the United States mails, military and Indian supplies, and do all the transportation the Government requires, including the transmission of telegraphic dispatches, without any limit as to time, from and after the period when the road shall be completed. For all these services they ask that the Government of the United States shall pay the interest on the company's bonds at the rate of 5 per cent. on $8,000 per mile for ten years; the whole distance, however, not to exceed seven hundred miles, from Salt Lake Valley to Portland, making altogether the sum of $280,000 per annum, after the completion of the road, which the United States will be required to pay, and this sum for only ten years.

For several years prior to July last the contractors for carrying the United States mails from Kelton to Portland were paid $242,000. In July, 1874, a contract was let to carry them from Kelton to The Dalles for $67,900, but it happened to go to a straw-bidder, who forfeited his contract on the 1st of December last. The Postmaster-General since then entered into another contract, terminating on the 30th June, 1878, by which the mails will be carried from Kelton to The Dalles for $134,700 per annum, and I am well satisfied that this sum is quite as low as they can be carried by the present mode of conveyance. From The Dalles to Portland the cost of transportation is, I think, $16,500, making in all $151,200 now paid for carrying the mails over the line of the proposed railroad. For the transportation of military supplies, and telegraphic and signal services, over the same line the Government paid in 1873 the sum of $27,714, which no doubt is a less amount than will be hereafter paid annually for the same service. I have no data to show how much was paid during the past year for transportation of Indian supplies and annuity goods for the several Indian tribes on the different reservations in Oregon and in Washington and Idaho Territories, but certainly it was no inconsiderable sum.

If this bill should pass, and the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad be constructed under it, all these services would be performed by the company without any payment or cost other than that paid as interest upon its bonds. In addition to all this, the mail-route from Boise City to Winnemucca could well be dispensed with if the proposed railroad were completed, for the mails could then be more speedily carried between those points by railway to Kelton and thence by the Central Pacific Railroad to Winnemucca than they are now carried by stage-coaches. The amount paid for this service is $47,000 per annum. To recapitulate what I have already stated in detail, the Government would pay to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company $280,000 annually for ten years, and receive in return services for which it is now paying $225,914 yearly; while these services for the Government would not be limited to ten years, but would be performed without any limitation as to time or amount, and with the absolute certainty that they would constantly increase in value and importance.

It now takes nine days in winter and seven in summer to transport the mails from Kelton to Portland. With this railroad completed it could easily be done in two, and at once it would become the great mail-route for the Columbia River basin, for Alaska, and for British Columbia; and commerce would be greatly increased between our own country and the British possessions on the north.

In addition to all this, the public lands, now almost valueless because inaccessible, would speedily be settled and occupied by men from the Atlantic States, many of whom are now desiring to go there to provide homes for themselves and their families.

Mr. President, this bill provides that nothing shall be paid by the United States Government to the railroad company, and no guarantee of interest shall be made until the road shall be completed as a first-class road and accepted as such; that is, until it shall be completed in sections of twenty-five miles. Whenever and as often as a section of twenty-five miles shall be constructed and accepted by commissioners appointed to examine it, then, and only in that case, will the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to indorse upon the company's bonds a guarantee that the Government will pay the interest on $8,000 per mile of finished road, the interest to cease, as I before stated, at the expiration of ten years.

The bill further provides that this guarantee of interest shall not be indorsed upon the bonds of the company until it shall be made to appear that there are no liens of any kind whatever upon the road. It is also provided that the services to be rendered to the United States by the company shall inhere in and become a part of the corporate existence of the company and be a lien upon and attach to the road and its equipments, and be performed by the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company, or its assignees or successors, whether such transfer or succession be made voluntary or by act of the Legislature of Oregon or by sale under process of any court. In short, every precaution has been taken by the Committee on Railroads to secure the Government against any loss and against all danger.

It may be said that the financial condition of this country is such that it would be impolitic to pass this bill at the present session of Congress. I do not think this a proper objection to be urged against its passage. It would hardly be possible to construct a section of twenty-five miles within a year from this time, and until that is done the Government will be under no obligation to pay anything as interest upon the company's bonds, nor indeed will it have anything to pay until six months after the indorsement by the Secretary of the Treasury. It will be apparent, therefore, that for at least a year and a half the United States will be required to pay nothing. Meanwhile I hope—indeed I have but little doubt—that the financial condition of the country and of the Treasury will be restored to a condition of comparative prosperity, and the Government quite able and willing to pay the small sum that might be due as interest upon the company's bonds, over and above the amount it will save in the transportation of mails and the performance of other services by the railroad company.

Much more I would like to say in support of this bill, but the expiration of the morning hour admonishes me that I must close my remarks upon it, and give place to the orders of the day. I shall take occasion hereafter, when the bill is again before Senate, to give other reasons in support of it, which for want of time I must now necessarily omit.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the Chair.) The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Before that is taken up, I wish to say a word. Yesterday, reporting the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, I took occasion to give notice to the Senate that at an early day I should ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. I desire now to repeat that we have arrived at that period in the session when it is apparent I think to the Senate that the current ordinary and necessary business of the session must take precedence in the order of business; and therefore, with a view of economy of time and that we may make the most of the time between this and Monday next, I take occasion now to renew the notice I gave yesterday, that on Monday at one o'clock I shall invite the attention of the Senate to the consideration of this bill and move that it be taken up to the exclusion of the present order, and I should hope of any other business which might at that time be pressed upon the Senate. I greatly trust and hope that I shall have the countenance of the Senate in so doing.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I know that there are several Senators who desire to speak on the Louisiana question on both sides of the Chamber, I hope it may be taken as the unanimous sense of the Senate that we may meet to-morrow, sitting as late to-night as we can, so as to give Senators an opportunity to express their views on the Louisiana question. I think a great majority of the Senate will feel that it is necessary to support the motion of the Senator from Maine to take up the legislative appropriation bill on Monday. A clear understanding should be had on all sides that the speeches on Louisiana shall be made to-night and to-morrow. We might continue the session to-night if necessary for that purpose. I make no motion, but I suppose with general consent we may agree that no motion shall be made to-day to adjourn over, but that we shall continue the discussion to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that there are gentlemen who wish to discuss the question who are not now in the Chamber, and of course they ought not be concluded.

SWAMP LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WEST. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of all lands listed to the State of Louisiana under the swamp-land act of Congress of March 2, 1849, in township 12 south, ranges 11 and 12 east, southeastern district of Louisiana, east of the Mississippi River; and that he accompany that statement with the documentary and other evidence upon which such lands have been declared swamp and overflowed under the act aforesaid.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the object of that resolution. Does it relate to lands near the mouth of the Mississippi?

Mr. WEST. O no; some lands within the corporate limits of New Orleans.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4324) to authorize the change of the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 4213) to provide for compensating the officers of the Government in observing the transit of Venus; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4214) declaratory of the act entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," approved June 22, 1874.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senate to this extent; it is so difficult to be heard in this Chamber unless the voice of the speaker is in the best possible condition for speaking, that I trust there will not be as much loud conversation on the floor of the Senate as there was yesterday while I was attempting to discuss this important resolution.

In the message of the President of the United States, transmitted to the Senate and laid on our tables yesterday, I find that a reference is made to the election of 1872 in Louisiana. The President says of that election:

The election was a gigantic fraud, and there were no reliable returns of the result.

I desire to interpose against that declaration of the message of the President of the United States an article which was addressed to him in the New Orleans Republican of January 24, 1873. This document is recorded in the book of testimony in the case of the report of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to Louisiana affairs. I find it in "Senate Reports, Louisiana Investigation, Third Session, Forty-second Congress," on page 274, and I desire to read a portion of it, in order to show clearly and conclusively that the President must be mistaken when he says that the Louisiana election of 1872 was a gigantic fraud. At that time the editor of his own organ in the city of New Orleans addressed to the President of the United States a portion of an editorial in the following language:

In our testimony we have so recently reviewed the positions of the parties contending for the control of the public affairs of the State, that it is unnecessary to comment further at this moment. But as it is rumored that the President is preparing his message with the most kindly sentiments toward the southern people, we deem it a duty to add the testimony of the Republican as impressing those sentiments more strongly upon him. This testimony cannot but from our stand-point be accepted as impartial. The Republican, then, assures the President that no people were ever more orderly and obedient to law than the people of New Orleans and Louisiana in the State and Federal elections recently held; that the relations between the races are kindly and cordial, the colored people voting by the side of the whites openly without military protection, State or Federal, and free from insult or molestation whatever. Difficulties which have arisen since the election are simply official, and are not alleged to have sprung from any force or fraud of the people. The controversy now pending has not arisen from the casting of the vote but from the counting of the vote. This vindication of order and harmony is not only proper for Executive consideration, but to counteract, so far as it may, the slander that New Orleans is under control of lawless mobs. This slander has not only prejudiced the mind of Congress, but has impeded immigration and excluded capital.

Now comes an important part of this document:

Whatever, then, may be the result of legal or political questions growing out of the Louisiana elections, the Republican deems it a duty to assure all whose opinion may have a bearing upon the political or commercial condition of New Orleans and Louisiana that the people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, have demeaned themselves well and deserved well of the country for their conduct in the recent State and Federal elections.

I must call the attention of the Senate especially to these two documents; the President saying to us yesterday that the election of 1872 was a gigantic fraud; and his own mouth-piece, the official organ of the party in Louisiana, from the city of New Orleans, boasting of the harmony, of the cordiality, of the kindly feelings that exhibited themselves between the colored and the white people in that same election which was "a gigantic fraud;" and then repeating again, coming back to the same proposition after he had left it, and declaring that something more than common was due to the people of Louisiana for the manner in which they had carried that election which the President says was a gigantic fraud. This editor wrote this article for the President's special attention. He says the reason he writes it is that he does not want the President to fall into a mistake. He says he understands the President is preparing a message for Congress in a kind spirit, and he wishes him to understand that he cannot exhaust his powers of eulogy for the manner in which those people have conducted themselves in that election. I put it not too pointedly; I put it as it is when I read again the concluding part of that document:

The people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, have demeaned themselves well, and deserve well of the country for their conduct in the recent State and Federal elections.

I stand by that instruction of the editor of the President's organ of that day, for it was written at a time when this tumult had not swept over the land, in which it was not necessary to prove that these people had been guilty of such frauds in that election as that the election itself was "a gigantic fraud." I put, then, the President's instructions from New Orleans, in January, 1873, as to the fairness, the quiet, the amicable relations existing between the voters of that State, regardless of race and color, without Federal protection and without the arms of the State of Louisiana, against his assertion in his message of yesterday that that election was "a gigantic fraud."

I now desire to call your attention to another part of the message which the President has just submitted to the Senate, and it is that in which he gives us to understand how and why the troops of the United States were in Louisiana and in New Orleans, and why they were called upon, and why they were used in the conflict in the Legislature on the 4th of January of this year. He says, in regard to that:

Troops had been sent to the State under this requisition of the governor—

That was in September—and as other disturbances seemed imminent—

After the troops had discharged whatever duty he intended them to perform; after they ought to have returned to their barracks, wherever they were; after the troops having discharged their duty, should have been withdrawn from the State, he takes it for granted that he may leave them there. Why?

They were allowed to remain there to render the executive such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State, and repress the continued violence which seemed inevitable the moment Federal support should be withdrawn.

That then is just this: the President believes himself at liberty to use the Army of the United States—our Army, the people's Army—for the purpose of gratifying the governor of a State who wants to borrow the military of the United States and keep them under his control and in his possession until such time as he may find something for them to do. Thus they were left, and whatever explanation may be put upon that language in any other part of the message, that view of the question accords directly and entirely with the view of his right over the Army that was exhibited to the people of Louisiana two years before. When he gave them the Army two years before, it was precisely on this same basis. They said to the President: "There are rumors that there may be difficulties, and we therefore ask you for the use of the Army." Here he says they satisfied him that there might be difficulty and that they might want an army, and as he had an army, in the kindness of his disposition to his political friend, the governor of Louisiana, he says: "Certainly keep the Army there and perhaps an opportunity may offer when I may be able to use it." He seems to have desired that his soldiery should not rust out for want of use, and that whenever there is an opportunity for them to do something they should be on hand, that the governor should have the privilege without any requisition on the President, according to the Constitution, to use the Army. Therefore we have it understood that that use of the Army was given upon the same old basis of "Use it at your pleasure and return it when you are done with it."

How does that agree with the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution is explict that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence." No provision is made whatever for furnishing in anticipation. A governor may be timid, he may honestly believe he will need military; a governor may be despotic, and may desire to use military. In either case it may never be proper to allow the use of the military; but when he has them in advance, it has passed beyond the power of the President to judge. That will answer very well to satisfy and allay the feelings of his party friends in the South. "I left the Army there in order that the executive of Louisiana might have the advantage of it if he deemed it necessary to use it." And then further on in his message he says, in answer to a dispatch of Governor Kellogg, that which will be very palatable at the North:

Your dispatch of this date just received. It is exceedingly unpalatable to use troops in anticipation of danger. Let the State authorities be right, and then proceed with their duties without apprehension of danger. If they are then molested, the question will be determined whether the United States is able to maintain law and order within its limits or not.

That is for northern consumption. When they gave them in the Durell case, the troops they gave were in anticipation of danger. When Casey asked for troops, it was in anticipation of danger. When Packard asked for troops, it was in anticipation of danger. When these troops were left with Kellogg, it was in anticipation of danger. And after the deed has been done, then very blandly and apparently honestly, your President says that it is exceedingly distasteful and unpalatable to use troops in anticipation of danger, and therefore that will sound very well at the North. Its counterpart will sound with his partisans at the South very palatable. In olden times we had an exhibition of politicians riding two horses at the same time. We have the same acrobatic feat—if that is the term, and there are enough gentlemen here who know whether it is or not—at the present time.

Now I wish to say one word in regard to how the olden doctrine of the Constitution has been obliterated, lost, and destroyed on this subject. I say to the Senate in advance that if a little corporation in the State of Louisiana to-day, whether it is for the purpose of operating a ferry-boat on a river, or for the purpose of controlling a market-house, or whether it is in reference to a slaughter-pen—and that would be a very appropriate subject to connect with their operations—any little handful of men incorporated in the State of Louisiana to-day, if you threaten them, if you send abroad in that community a report that perhaps they are not entirely safe, they honestly conceive that it is their business to draw a requisition on the President of the United States for the use of the Army! Senators, unless you have been looking into this precious document sent us by the President, some of you are taken by surprise that I should make an assertion of that kind in the face of the Senate and of the country. Ardent as I may be, impetuous sometimes, you never find me using documents without great care and discretion. Then you anticipate that I will prove this. I ask the Secretary to read what I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, December 10, 1874.

President GRANT, Washington, D. C.:

I transmit the following dispatch by request of Ex-Governor Wells, president of the returning board.

WM. P. KELLOGG.

NEW ORLEANS, December 10, 1874.

President GRANT:

Authentic information in possession of the returning board justifies them in believing that an attack is intended upon the Saint Louis Hotel, now occupied as a State-house, wherein the returning board holds its sessions, and where the returns of the late elections are deposited. The board has nearly completed a careful and impartial canvass of the returns, in compliance with law, and expect to make promulgations therefrom as soon as the same can be properly compiled. The members of the board are being publicly and privately threatened with violence, and an attack upon the State-house, which is likely to result in bloodshed, is also threatened. By request of the board, I respectfully ask that a detachment of troops be stationed in the State-house, so that the deliberations and final action of the board may be free from intimidation and violence.

J. MADISON WELLS,
President of State Returning Board.

Mr. TIPTON. There is the proof of the allegation which I make in reference to the demoralization of the republican party in the State of Louisiana, as respects the power of the President to furnish them the Army. There are a few clerks performing the clerical duty of adding up the election returns, making the footings, for the purpose of exhibiting the result in the State of Louisiana; and while those gentlemen in the discharge of their clerical duties in the Saint Louis Hotel are occupied, there are rumors that they may be disturbed in their deliberations, and they draw up a requisition on the President of the United States for the Army, hand it over to the governor of Louisiana, and the governor of Louisiana transmits it to the President of the United States, without note or comment, in order that these gentlemen may have their constitutional privilege under the Constitution of the United States of being protected in their clerical labor by the Army of the United States!

What next? The Army used for the purpose of enforcing order in Pennsylvania on election day, as was exhibited to the people of Pennsylvania in the canvass of 1871, when Governor Geary protested before the country in regard to the use of the Army for any such purpose; the Army used for election purposes in the State of New York in the same year, when Governor Hoffman protested against the interference of the Army; the Army used for the purpose of perambulating the State of Louisiana in charge of the marshal of the United States, while he is ostensibly engaged in enforcing the laws of the United States, and while he is really out electioneering for the party; the Army is used for the purpose of enforcing the mandates of a Federal judge; the Army used for the purpose of seizing State-houses at two o'clock in the morning; the Army used for the purpose of surrounding a State-house, in order that none but the faithful shall enter, in the year 1875; and now the Army is called upon for the purpose of assisting a returning board in counting and ascertaining the result of an election; and that seems to be the condition to which the country is reduced at the present time, in that portion of it at least, in regard to their understanding of constitutional privileges—so loose has been the practice of the Government in regard to the use of the Army.

On this subject of the duty of military men, in a message of the the governor of Illinois, I remember, two years ago he said:

I also deny that the officers of the Army have the right to determine the measure of the duties of any civil officer, under any circumstances whatever, or that their powers are increased by any emergency that can possibly happen in the affairs of any State. These are not, as they seem to suppose, the natural rulers of the people.

I hold that to be sound in regard to the Army officers of the United States, that they are not to judge in civil affairs in regard to what may be the interests of a State or the interests of individuals; but it is their business only in those cases to act their part where they act it exclusively under the Constitution and within the lines prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

Again, the President attempts to prepare the country for the doctrine of a United States despotism. In this message he says:

That the courts of the United States have the right to interfere in various ways with State elections, so as to maintain political equality and rights therein, irrespective of race or color, is comparatively a new and to some seems to be a startling idea; but it results as clearly from the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution and the acts that have been passed to enforce that amendment as the abrogation of State laws upholding slavery results from the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Here the startling doctrine is announced for the first time officially in the history of this country that the United States courts have jurisdiction over State elections. If State elections are not exclusively the privilege of the people, then what are our liberties worth? You tell me I may cast my vote as a freeman. After that vote is cast it must be counted. That vote for a State officer must be counted and ascertained by the authority of the individual State. After that vote has been ascertained by the authority of the individual State, then the persons elected under it must be permitted to hold their offices; and if a contest arises, the State courts are the only tribunals to which the question can be referred for adjudication: it may be perhaps by mandamus, it may be perhaps by the writ of quo warranto; but in all cases it must be to the court of my own individual State. If I am elected a member of the Legislature, I have the right under the constitution to be the judge, with my fellow-members, of who are eligible to seats in that body. The governor of my State has no power over that question. The governor of my State can have no power over that question. The President of the United States can have no power over that question. No State outside of my own State limits can have authority over that question. That is my question; it is the question of my neighbors; it is the question of my fellow-citizens. We in our individual capacity, in our own precincts, in our own townships, do our own voting; cast up the results according to our own State laws; and then purge our State Legislatures of those who are not entitled to seats as members by the authority of the individual and local State laws.

I remember well to have witnessed that scene in the Legislature of Ohio—for I was in the State-house every day during its continuance—at a time when the democrats had organized on one side of the house and the whigs had organized not ten feet away from the speaker's desk, and there were two legislative bodies pretending to be in session. A former United States Senator from Ohio, Mr. Pugh, was at that time interested in the proceedings of the democratic party. The Hon. Mr. Olds, a brother of a distinguished politician of Ohio, who has been in the other branch of Congress, was also an active politician. I remember seeing Mr. Pugh standing upon a desk addressing a speaker there, when ten feet away from him—Mr. Olds stood upon a desk addressing a speaker to the right, as though each individual was certain he was addressing the properly-constituted speaker of the house of representatives of the State of Ohio. If that difficulty could not have been settled amicably after two or three weeks of protracted struggle, even then the forces of the State of Ohio might not have ultimately been called upon for the purpose of forcing a settlement. But at that time nobody supposed that the proper way was to come to Washington and appeal to the President for the troops of the United States for the purpose of either overawing or ejecting any portion of the Legislature. It was a proposition too horrible to have been received at the time by any man. No, no, Mr. President, these are our own local questions. At the present time, when party spirit runs high, they may be considered of trifling moment, but after you shall have stripped this question of the inalienable rights of men, of the peculiar franchise of freemen; when you shall have stripped it of all extraneous political considerations, the people of this country will die upon the field of battle rather than ever concede to the doctrine of the President's message. Sir, when it comes down to that, you will get an issue square and straight; there will be no Mason and Dixon's line in such a contest as that. The question will not be a local question of slavery in three or four or ten States out of thirty. The question will not be a question of manufactures, that might cause the East to rise in mutiny. The question will not be a question of mining, that might cause Colorado and Nevada and California to defy the authority of the United States. But it will come to my hearth-stone, it will come to your hearth-stone, and it will come to the hearth-stone of every family in the limits of this Republic of ours; and you cannot divide the country then by Mason and Dixon's line, but all men everywhere will have a deep interest in this question of local self-government by the people in their State capacities independent of the Government of the United States. Then, when it comes in that way, the people will settle it, and the distracting politicians will die politically before the power of the people.

If a President desires to strengthen his party, how would he work under this assumption of the message? Just as he has operated in the State of Louisiana. With that doctrine, suppose a President of the United States looks to his United States judge in Louisiana; he is interested in the passage of a great national measure. The Senate of the United States is almost a tie or entirely a tie upon that question. He appeals to his district judge in the State where the result is to be produced. He simply follows in the footsteps of Durell. He claims under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution that he has an equitable right to enter into the question of the election of the officials of the State and settle that question. It is settled by the use of the Army according to the original precedent set in 1872. We stand upon the precedent and we use the Army, and we thus elect our Administration Senators and bring them into this Hall, and when the question is taken, by the bayonets we have worked out the problem and our political question has triumphed in the United States Senate.

With a man in the Presidency who has no such desire, with a man in the Presidency such as perhaps has generally occupied that chair, we may have no fear of such a result; but what do we know in regard to the future? If we may anticipate it by what we know of the past and the immediate present, the time may come in this Government, with a little more lawlessness, with a little more disregard of the inalienable rights of the citizen, with a little more contempt for the precious boon of local self-government and it treated as an abstraction, as belonging to an exploded theory of State rights, with a little more of that in the country the time may come when a tyrannical and despotic President of the United States will seize upon the privileges granted him by this message and by the practice of the party in power and thus hurl in ruin the fabric of our Government.

If this is to be decided by the courts of the land, a legitimate deduction from the fifteenth amendment, what of that? Why, this of that: whenever that is settled, whenever the United States courts shall say that such is a legitimate practice or may be a legitimate practice under the fifteenth amendment, then in this Senate and in the House of Representatives a proposition will be made to amend the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution, and it will be amended by the sovereign will of the people; for when the people passed the fifteenth amendment, intended to guarantee the right to vote of the colored man, they never for one single moment anticipated that by that act they were putting shackles upon States and putting States under the feet of Federal judges. That is my remedy. That is revolution through the ballot-box in answer to the omnipotent will of the sovereign people. Talk about sovereignty if you please; there is a principle of sovereignty, there is a principle of right as pure as ever God sent down from heaven to infuse life and vigor into the heart of man to impel him to patriotic acts and patriotic devotion—a principle which must live as original and must be protected as fundamental.

I think the whole judiciary of this country will not come to the conclusion that a question clouded in so much of uncertainty, that a question hedged around with so much of mystification, was ever a proposition worked out and developed by the brain of Judge Durell, of Louisiana. I think that the whole bar of the country, with devoted attention to constitutions and constitutional discussions, will never charge for one single moment that Judge Durell, without a book in his law or State library to guide him on the subject, had ever come to the decision of a question like that, which was to change the whole practice of the judiciary of the United States. You will not attribute that to Judge Durell. But as it has now emanated from the White House, I think the inference will have to be that it has to be fathered by the Cabinet of the President of the United States. If that is so, then I understand well enough, I understand perfectly what was meant by that order to Judge Durell. The marshal of the United States will sustain by the Army the mandates and the decisions of the United States courts; and then the next thing was to furnish the mandate, cut and dried. Let the judge be sure he has the Army, and then let him issue our mandate, and he father it!

If this is to be the practice and if the precedent is to be established, contemplate for a single moment the power which you have in the executive office in this nation. Is it true that we have sixty thousand office-holders? If we have sixty thousand office-holders, how many have we of expectants for office? Have we not ten for every office-holder? Go to your counties; remember who they are that appear there in your political discussions, remember who they are who perform the peculiar work of the primary elections. Are there not ten expectants for every office-holder? That would be six hundred thousand political missionaries, always working by day and by night, under the eye and the appointing power of the President of the United States—six hundred thousand. Then take all the marshals of the United States with the privilege and the power to control the Army. Then take all the governors with the privilege of borrowing troops and laying them away in barracks until an emergency arises. Then take all the corporations and take all the returning boards and give them troops also—they have as much right to them as the others have—and then what is the power of the President through the marshals of the United States? Then look into your courts. Your judicial circuits occupy all the territory of the United States. You have your judges everywhere, and those judges have the power to sit in judgment on State elections, says the message which we are considering to-day, and that is a part of the power of the President, if this doctrine is true. Well, then, you have also as you have at the present time your subsidized newspapers, those that are receiving money from the Treasury for services performed or services that they would perform if they were required. Then you have all that other class of newspapers that are the partisan oracles of the party in power, and you have them all under the moneyed consideration, "be careful what you say or the golden stream that otherwise might be caused to turn itself through your office shall be averted and turned aside." With that influence in addition to the rest, what power has the President of the United States—and when I speak of the President I speak of the representative of a party; I mean the party in power. Then when it comes here you all know how we struggle, how restive we become under the lash of party discipline. You all understand it. "You have been there yourselves; you anticipate me;" your minds are full of the subject; you all understand how restive you become when you are informed that this notion which is so tenaciously entertained by your constituency has not been favorably considered by a party caucus. How restive you become when your instructions from home say "Stand by that bill, a State's salvation depends upon it," when you are informed that such is not just the opinion of the omnipotent, omnipresent, and all-wise caucus.

I say then this is an additional instrument of political power, dangerous to the people, and to be resisted in every proper, constitutional, and legitimate way. Under such an administration as Jefferson's, under such an administration as preceded Jefferson's and immediately followed Jefferson's, no such power was ever supposed to attach to the executive authority of the United States. Thomas Jefferson, even if he had had sixty thousand office-holders, would have claimed no power over them. When he appointed a man, he appointed him to discharge a specific duty. He swore him into his office, turned his back upon him, and knew him never again unless he was charged with peculation, and then he simply knew him on the day of political execution. The doctrine of Thomas Jefferson was capacity, fidelity, trust; but that is seldom asked at the present time. It is a concomitant that merely may be submitted to; it is an incidental that may be slightly respected. What was the doctrine in the last campaign? Is he a worker; can he go down among the shanties in the fifth ward, and is he a power in the saloons? That was just as high a recommendation as virtue, better than fidelity and manly honor. The party! it must be preserved. Jackson said, "the Union! it must be preserved."

I believe the honorable Senator from Illinois in the discussion of this question talked very much about war. He fancied that somebody was going to fight, and wherever he found the man who was restrained by fetters he talked to him more about war, much as a pugilistic child would who seemed to be all uncomfortable and "spoiling" for want of a physical contest. War, forsooth! Where would the Senator go for war? To the people of the South? And if he were to go to the people of the South for an exhibition of war, where over all that land would he find room sufficient to pitch their tents if they did not pitch them upon the graves of their fallen countrymen?

He would go to the South for war; to a people despoiled of all their substance in the past, having accumulated nothing since the time of the desolation. Any child can go to war against such a prostrate, fallen, submissive foe as that. He would go to war with the people who have no peculiar institution now for which to wage a contest. I say that Massachusetts and New England might afford to revolt. I say that the Northwest may afford to revolt; but I say that the people of the South are a people who never will be the first to revolt, but only to strike when they have been smitten. What have they now? They have an agricultural interest. That agricultural interest is so great that it binds them and unites them with the destiny of the agricultural interest of the North, of the East, and of the West. What have they besides? They have a manufacturing interest. That is tied up in the manufacturing interests of New England. They have a mineral interest; that is tied up with the interest of Nevada, of California, of the green mountains of the West. They have a commercial interest; and that is tied up with the cities of New York and of Philadelphia and of Baltimore. All these interests are now a common interest. They have nothing peculiar to them, only that they are at the present time the victims of a political tyranny from which in a short time they hope that the better judgment of the North will emancipate them. That is the people with whom the honorable gentleman proposes to have a war. Indiscreet men they have; who wishes to live and fatten on their desolation? Libelous men they have; who wishes to soil his political hands by their garbage? Only they who have a taste for and a natural disposition for such refreshments. They have men among them as editors who are intemperate, but of course we have no intemperate editors at the North; of course we have no seditious men at the North; of course we have no desperate men in the city of New York, and other cities of the North; but it is all there, and there is where the volcano is to explode.

Just here, unless I should forget it, the honorable Senator I believe contended that the democratic party of this country had been forty years in power, and the result, the finale, the grand climax, the magnificent denouement, was the destruction of the country. O, what a slight honor can be awarded them for that in point of time! The republican party, of which the honorable Senator is such a distinguished leader at the present time, has accomplished that in twenty-four months in the State of Louisiana. Twenty-four months against forty years! The race is improving; but before they were able to accomplish that they had to educate the prince of darkness up to the standard so that he could comprehend the situation and do justice to the occasion.

Following the example of the honorable Senator, I will return to a point upon which I have already animadverted. I say that when the President of the United States left the Army in Kellogg's keeping, in Kellogg's barracks, in order that when he wanted them he could order them, the President ought to have understood what was likely to be the use that would be made of them. Says this message, as innocently as though the President expected anybody to believe him, that really he knew nothing of this matter until he heard it through the public papers. He ought to have supposed that perhaps they would use the Army for the purpose of seizing a State-house. Why? Because they had used it for seizing a State-house two years before. Is not that a legitimate deduction? He might have supposed that they would probably use it to silence democratic editors, because Casey, collector of customs, had told him that they would like to have a little sprinkling of military down there, for an editor was trying to turn the public against them. He might have supposed that the troops might have been used for the purpose of turning the tide in their favor, for he had been shown before in documents that it was necessary to give it in order to turn the tide in their favor. He might have anticipated that it would be used for purposes, perhaps, of organizing political meetings; because what part had the Army not played in New Orleans more than two years ago? The army more than two years ago was stationed around a political convention that was held in the custom-house, and United States troops were drawn up in the custom-house. That was no question between republicans and democrats; it was in the republican party itself. It has differed about everything else, but it has never differed in regard to the use to make of the Army. The President might therefore have supposed that they would organize political meetings with the Army of the United States, as they had done heretofore. This act was denounced in the message of Governor Warmoth, and the appeal was made to the consideration of the whole country.

Now, with all this done against the people of Louisiana, I contend that their forbearance has been great. I contend that, after all this turbulence thrown upon them, they, in the language of the editor from whom I have quoted to-day, deserve well of the country for the manner in which they have behaved themselves. I say further on that subject that everything with them was at stake when the question came of the Army controlling their elections.

A few days ago the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] not now in his seat, said that he had forgotten for the time being the Declaration of Independence. I have no doubt about that. It was an honest admission. I only fear that his party has also forgotten the Declaration of Independence; and I do think, if I were in the attitude of the people of Louisiana, I would feel comfort and consolation from reading its immortal truths. Therefore I shall ask the Clerk to read that portion of the Declaration of Independence which I send to him, for it seems to have been written not for one age, but for all time, and to be especially applicable to the present condition in the State of Louisiana.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government. * * * * *

The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world:

* * * * * * * * *

He has * * * sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislature.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined, with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation.

* * * * * * * * *

In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress, in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, that is rather a new production. I have no doubt but Senators may like to have it read; and it may have misled some of the people in the State of Louisiana. It says there are times when it is the duty—not only the privilege—when it is their right and their duty to throw off a government. It also asserts, among other things, that standing armies are distasteful to a free people in time of peace. It also protests against combinations with those who would oppress, and says that in every stage of these oppressions they have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms, and their repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. I remember an illustrious example of this two years ago in the case of the people of Louisiana. They sent a committee of one hundred distinguished men of their State, men trusted by the people of Louisiana, for the purpose of holding a conference with the President of the United States. They were met by a dispatch from the Attorney-General saying that they need not come; that the mind of the President was made up and would not be changed. These are the circumstances under which their petitions have been met. If, therefore, they should come to the conclusion that Kellogg was a prince whose character was "marked by every act which may define a tyrant," and that he was "unfit to be the ruler of a free people," you need not be astonished, and if they would also add to the declaration that he is not fit to breathe the air of freedom, I do not think that should be a cause for any gentleman to say that they who uttered it mean assassination.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to indulge in rather a discursive manner, having been confined so closely heretofore to the subject of debate. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said in his place here that murder was organized for the purpose of destroying the republican party in the South. I felt that if ever there had been an organization for the purpose of destroying the republican party by murder, that organization would now disband forever. Inasmuch as the republican party has destroyed itself, their occupation would be gone, and gone forever.

But we are also told that in that Legislature in Louisiana the conservatives called upon the military of the United States. That is certainly a conclusion to which the gentleman comes who has a peculiar idea in regard to responsibility. What were the facts in the case? Suppose that a bomb-shell had been cast into that hall where the house of representatives was attempting to organize, and suppose the presiding officer of that Legislature had seized the bomb-shell before it exploded and hurled it out into the lobby among the rabble that were there, for the purpose of expelling them; what then? Would you have charged him with having originated the mode of controlling a Legislature by the use of bomb-shells? No, sir; he would take advantage of your criminal act to save himself and his fellow-men and cast the bomb-shell out among the rabble where if it exploded at all it might perform its work there. Or if General De Trobriand had called at the private residence of Speaker Wiltz and if General De Trobriand had been on a hunting excursion, as southern gentlemen sometimes are, and if his pack of hounds had followed him to the premises of Speaker Wiltz, and after he entered the parlor and while he was engaged in conversation with the speaker if his hounds had raised a disturbance with the watch-dog of the speaker's mansion, what would the speaker be likely to do? He would ask him politely if he would please step to the hall and call off his dogs; and that is all Speaker Wiltz did. He found the hounds, the political hounds, of this officer of the Army belaboring and setting upon his officers of the peace in the lobby, and knowing that the owner of the dogs could do more with them than anybody else, said he, "General De Trobriand, will you please step out into the hall and call off your dogs?" [Laughter.]

And then not only one Senator but all the Senators who have brains and whose reputation in the country will as a matter of course cause the populace to believe all that emanates from their gigantic intellects get together, hold a consultation, and say, "Well, we think after mature deliberation that that one fact that Wiltz called upon the military will be sufficient to checkmate the whole democracy of the country," when all that had been done was to call off the hounds. And that is the political sagacity, and that is political fairness, and that is an index of the honor from which it springs! The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] as well as the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] had much to say, O! they had tomes to say, they had volumes to circulate, on the question of intimidation; and if they could find a district in the United States where there was no colored vote polled, there they flaunted the record before us and said "Intimidation! Intimidation!" They went into the district of Hon. A. H. STEPHENS, the recent vice-president of the Confederate States, and "there," they say, "is an evidence of intimidation that will answer all you gentlemen; we refer you to the fact that the African was not permitted to vote in the district of Mr. STEPHENS, and why? O! intimidation." What was the reply? The Africans met in convention and declared that they would vote for Mr. STEPHENS, and there were consequently none to vote against him. I ask the Clerk to read a note from Mr. STEPHENS on this subject, to show how far intimidation affected the colored people in his district.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

There was no party opposition to me at either of the elections, the one last fall or the one in February, 1873. At the last election I was nominated by the regular democratic convention. The republican convention met afterward, and by their action indorsed the nomination. All the leading republicans in the district voted for me.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, this is humiliating; this is sorrowful; this causes any man sorrow who ever has been personally attached to any of these gentlemen, to say nothing of politically affiliated with them in their better days, to say of the Senate of the United States that such claptrap as that has been resorted to in order to prove intimidation; that whenever they find a man like Alexander H. Stephens, who has the affection of the colored population of his district to such an extent that they met together and renominated him after the conservatives had taken him up, and they all vote for him, then the cry is made that here is a man elected and there was no opposition, because they were afraid to vote against him. That is the stuff out of which all the argument and much of the eloquence of gentlemen has been developed in the last few days.

Now, in regard to intimidation, the idea is here, the idea is everywhere with the party, that unless the old slavery question in some bearing can be worked up right now, unless this African subject can be appropriated and the water turned upon their mill-wheel, their grinding will cease. That is the feeling. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] indicated it the other day when he said in his place here that in three months after the colored man had his rights guaranteed and protected both the political parties of the country would be disorganized, meaning thereby that they would have no stock in trade to keep them together after that. Inasmuch as the democratic party does not seem to use that stock in trade to any great extent, and inasmuch as our republican brethren are those who deal in this stock, that explains to me the reason why they are never going to let this question cease. Why is it? They have had the power here to pass the civil-rights bill and settle this question forever. They have had the power in the other House; they have had the power in the Senate; and yet they have not settled it. They say that after it is settled, in three months they will be disbanded. They do not want to disband, and therefore they do not want to settle it. That is the legitimate conclusion. They cannot reply to that. That is the legitimate conclusion. The facts are against them. The records of the Senate are against them. But when it is necessary to hoodwink the colored man, they can pass a civil-rights bill through the Senate, and then go to the country and say, "Boys, now to the rescue; we have passed the bill through the Senate; send us back to the House, and we will put it through the House also." But they come back to the House and they do not put it through the House, and the bill fails. Then the next year, I suppose, the House can pass it and the Senate can give it the goby. Thus floating before the country is the idea of a civil-rights bill; but they never have given a civil-rights bill to their African friends who stand by them in their political organization. They are doubled-faced in this matter; they are Janus-faced; they are attempting to look both ways; and the country begins to understand them.

You said by your Senate bill that you proposed to go into our States, and you intended to lay your hands upon our hotels, and you would let us understand that our hotels should be run as you dictated. You dare not do that. Too many men keep hotels and sell whisky for you to be able to afford it. [Laughter.] You cannot give up the pabulum on which you have flourished. Forty-rod liquor is too powerful an engine in carrying elections to be disregarded in a civil-rights bill. You said by that bill, which you have advocated here, that you would go into our States by the authority of the Government of the United States, with the stars and stripes floating, with the drums beating, and you would give us to understand that you would revise our systems of education. Too many men send children to school; you dare not do it, and you have not done it. You can put it through one body, but you dare not undertake to put it through the other.

You said in your discussion of that bill that you would know whether there was any such thing as State sovereignty or State lines, and you said you would come into our States, the States of the people, and that you would there legislate in regard to their theaters, their places of amusement, and you would see whether they devoted their money to the erection of theatrical buildings and then undertook to control who should go to the theater. O, why do you not pay some attention to the erection of churches and dot them over this land? Why do you not go out as missionaries in behalf of the Gospel? But no; you feel that the great educator of the people is the theater, the exhibitions of the Black Crook, and higher displays of theatrical genius and decency; and, therefore, that all the people throughout the land may have the benefit of theaters, you will go out and organize them and regulate them under the laws of the United States.

You said you would come into our States, and that you would undertake to regulate the use of our cemeteries. Well, when you come, come prepared; we will give you the hospitality of our cemeteries with a great deal of pleasure, [laughter,] but never, while the breath of freedom is breathed by us, never while the rights of freemen are dear to us, will you control the use of our cemeteries in our States. Our people are humane; our people are kind; our people if left alone are merciful; but our people are executioners of vengeance when they are probed by your bayonets. Let them alone. They will control education as they have controlled it in all time past. Let them alone. They will erect as few theaters as they may think necessary, and then they will not call upon you or trouble you in regard to their control. Let them alone, and the hospitality of their hotels will be for the wayfarers of the country; but force them, and after that see what will happen!

What do I propose as a remedy for these troubles? I propose in Louisiana that you call home your Army. What would be the result of that? I will tell you what would be the result of that. Such a state of things would finally come about as exists in Georgia, where white men and colored men all unite in sustaining STEPHENS unanimously for a seat in the House of Representatives. Call home your Army, and the first result will be the triumph of the conservatives politically in Louisiana. Very well. Colored men for a year or two may not hold office; but the colored man that has been in the rice-fields of Louisiana, the colored man who has toiled in the sugar-plantations of Louisiana, will not be harassed by a carpet-bagging politician as their governor; and I mean that in no offensive sense. All those gentlemen who are here and who are from the South understand me in that. I suppose we are all carpet-baggers in this country. New England has carpet-bagged all the West and Northwest, for her population is everywhere. That is legitimate. But this offensive carpet-bagging system, the pouring out all our political lazzaroni on their shores, is what I protest against.

The first result might be power in the hands of the conservatives down there; and what would be the next result? The colored man would go to his rice-field; he would go to his sugar-plantation; he would work, work, work, prepare to educate his children, prepare himself to discharge the duties of political life. He would not be left long in that attitude. O, no; an independent democratic conservative candidate would come up. He would say to the regular democratic nominee, "Sir, I dispute your right to the votes of this district; I am going to run myself;" and what would he do? Go right to the colored element, conciliate it—gentlemen, you know how that is done—conciliate the colored element, get all that vote for himself. They would not be assassinated, for then they would be voting for a conservative. He would be a shrewd, bolting conservative, and he would say to his political friends in their caucus, "Let us put one-half colored men on our ticket, and we will draw the whole colored vote to us." Then the regular democratic conservative nominee on the other side would say to his friends, "Let us put three-fourths colored candidates on our ticket, and then we will beat these fellows at their own game." The result would be in a short time that no ticket could be elected in Louisiana which did not have a number of prominent colored men upon it, and the only danger would be that everybody that was elected might be colored, because everybody would be singing peans to the glory of the colored voters, and how bravely the colored troops had fought. [Laughter.]

That is common sense. I am borne out in that by the experience of every man in this nation. I say the only salvation for the colored people, the dawn of happiness, of prosperity, is for those spirits of turbulence to be driven out of the South and your Army called home.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude the speech which I have had the privilege of making in the hearing of the Senate this morning, by referring to yet one or two more of the positions occupied by the honorable Senator from Illinois. I have thought that he dealt very harshly with the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. He has remembered, for he knows, what old democracy is. A man of his advanced years, who was so long in the service of that old hard-shell Bourbon democracy, knows what were the leading, fundamental principles of their creed in years long since gone. He therefore undertakes to arraign the democracy of the present day, and charges them with all he is familiar with of stratagem, of treason, and of spoils. Mr. President, I see the subject through a different pair of glasses. I understand it thus: In years gone by there was a whig party and a democratic party. They had organizations. They were the antipodes of each other. They fought their political battles. They had banks; they had tariffs; they had distribution of the proceeds of the public lands; they had questions of the policy of the day in which they flourished to quarrel about. They have both long since passed away. The principal part of these old democratic leaders drifted into the republican party, and now I could point them out all around these seats. Why, there is scarcely a man here, excepting some of the very young Senators, but was formerly of the old democratic party. They carried the abuses of the old democratic party into the republican party, and the new democracy, the superior democracy, the democracy of the Cincinnati and the Baltimore platforms, have had to combine against these olden democrats for their political destruction. In the State of Massachusetts BENJAMIN F. BUTLER was the old democratic representative of the republican party. The young democracy, the Cincinnati-platform democracy, gave him his quietus in the last fall election. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is the leader of the republican party of the Senate and of the United States. He was for years the bone and sinew, the brains, the will, and the authority of the old Bourbon democracy; but in the State of Illinois last fall the young democracy, the Cincinnati-platform democracy, laid the prospects of that Senator in the shade by electing a young, new democratic Legislature, based upon the principles of the rights of the people and local self-government. I say, therefore, that it is not astonishing that the honorable Senator should feel somewhat hard toward the new democracy, that is driving the old leaders to their political graves.

Of the platform of this new democracy suffice it to say, it contains a plea for the political equality of all men, for the Union of the States, for universal amnesty, for local self-government, for a purified civil-service, for equal taxation, for a return to specie payment, for justice among nations, and for the supremacy of the civil over the military power.

But, Mr. President, very honestly and very candidly, I say in my place I regret it. He may say to me, "That is not particularly your concern;" but I do regret that a man of his position before the country should deem it necessary to attack the stricken people of the South in the manner in which he has during this whole discussion. Senators from the South have been so attacked, they have been so denounced, they have been so pressed, (if you look for the pressing to the reports that will go out of these speeches,) that I scarcely know how they will be able to face a chivalrous, bold, and fighting constituency; and I have fancied that the object was to take advantage of the circumstances under which they were placed here. I did feel that a great injustice was done to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] the other day, when there seemed to be a studied effort to irritate and to goad that faithful representative. At that very time he had sent a dispatch to the people of Louisiana in which he had called upon them in words positive and unequivocal, "Bear all your tribulations; suffer, even suffer to manacles; but resist not the authority of the United States." While the honorable Senator from Georgia, in the spirit of the Cincinnati platform—of amity, of friendship, and healing of wounds, the spirit of conciliation, the spirit of magnanimity, the spirit of chivalry and of honor—was thus attempting to throw oil upon the troubled elements, that he should thus be attacked was to me most astounding, especially as he had just placed the fetters of peace upon hands that illustrated his valor in battle. The people of the country will understand it. Men are not to be badgered now from the North any more than it was once said, in the days of slavery, that they were not to be badgered from the South. We now stand upon a common platform, we now occupy the same position, and the people will apply the corrective. The people at the polls will give it the quietus; and the people of the North everywhere are determined that this everlasting tirade, this ebullition of hate, this pouring forth of blood, this varnishing of the skulls of a previous war and keeping them for future use, this playing on the bones in the Senate of the United States, this shaking of the skeletons before the Senate and the country, shall cease. That thing has been tried. That game was played in Illinois last fall. The honorable Senator—I know how eloquent he was; I know how persistent he was; I know how like an angel he was, flying from one portion of heaven to the other with the republican trumpet blowing the tocsin of war, telling about Penn's revolution, about the maimed and the decrepit soldiers of the South making a desperate effort to straighten up once more for the purpose of attacking the liberties of Illinois; I know how much of that speech was made to his people. They heard it; they treated him like a gentleman; but they voted for the modern democracy!

It was so, Mr. President, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair,) in your own State of Pennsylvania. You had been the author of thirteen volumes, printed on foolscap, containing reports of outrages in the South. That document had gone all over Pennsylvania. You had at least from one hundred thousand to five hundred thousand of a majority—probably one hundred thousand majority for Hartranft. It was an immense multitude that no man scarcely could number and expect to live. The books were carried in peddlers' packs all over the State. They were read for thirteen nights in succession, one volume every night, at the miner's cabin, around the doors of the furnaces, among the poor, impoverished laborers in the mines of Pennsylvania; but they saw through the flimsy disguise. They simply went to the polls on election day and registered their edict that a party that proposed to live on blood when they were scarcely able to live for want of bread should go to political pandemonium; and that edict stands registered at the present time.

I leave this question with the Senate. I am in favor of the passage of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] in order that the Judiciary Committee, in a cool, fair, manly, and dispassionate manner, may look into the subject, and I trust without partisan bias be able to come to the conclusion that there is a government of the people in Louisiana in abeyance; that the duty of this Government is to call home her Army, and no longer aggravate and exasperate the people of that State.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment. I do not wish to detain the Senate, nor do I wish to make any remarks in criticism or reply at all to what has been said by my friend from Nebraska; but inasmuch as he suggested to me that there was a democratic Legislature in my State, I ask permission to have a telegram read from that Legislature on this question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, January 14, 1875.

Senators LOGAN and OGLESBY,
United States Senate:

The house of representatives has just laid a democratic resolution alleging unlawful interference in Louisiana on the table—83 to 62.

S. M. CULLOM.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire now to have read a certified copy of a telegram that was sent to the President of the United States, putting another phase on this case, showing now that the other side want the Army. I only ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, January 14, 1875—8 p. m.

TO U. S. GRANT,
President:

Seeing from your message that the interference by the military on Monday, the 4th, with the organization of the house of representatives of Louisiana was unauthorized by you, I now, as speaker of said house, ask you to direct the military to restore the statu quo existing at the time General De Trobriand ejected certain members from the house, in order that the house of representatives may proceed in the discharge of its duties without molestation.

LOUIS A. WILTZ,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of Louisiana.

A true copy.
LEVI P. LUCKY,
Private Secretary.

Mr. TIPTON. I have to say that I hope that will be granted, and that these gentlemen will not be humiliated by going back and undoing their tyrannical work.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I feel constrained to make a few calm remarks in this debate for the purpose of correcting a delusive impression which I fear is being made upon the people of the South, and for the purpose of counteracting, to the extent of my feeble ability, an injury which I believe is being done by positions here taken to the best interests of the country.

The allegation is made openly and repeatedly in the Congress of the nation, in the assemblies of the people, and in the public journals, that there has been inaugurated, has long continued, and now exists a system of outrage, murder, and assassination at the South, the deliberate design and purpose of which is to deprive American citizens of their constitutional rights. It is not for me to say that this allegation is true; that would be but the opinion of an individual; but I will very briefly call attention to some of the considerations which seem to prove the charge.

While it is true that "common rumor," to use a rough maxim, "is a common liar," yet the calm and deliberate conclusions of an impartial community, gathering their information from a hundred different sources, are entitled to much of the consideration that belongs to truth; and I feel that I may say that a large part of the community at the North believe that allegation to be true, and that the plain people of the country, who love their country better than any party, have painful apprehensions that it is true.

The fact that a large number of those against whom this system of terrorism is alleged to be directed omit to exercise the cherished right of voting, are discontented and seeking to remove from their homes, is further evidence of the truth of the charge.

The fact that some of the white people of the South who recently manifested their dissatisfaction with this Government by open revolt have since the close of the war displayed their hostility toward those who favored and sustained the Government by the organization of a secret order known as the Ku-Klux, who are proven by thirteen volumes of testimony to have been guilty of the most diabolical crimes, and that now another order is founded on the antagonism of race, as the name of "White League" alone sufficiently shows, is some evidence that the charge is true. We have the evidence of there having been several slaughters at the South, resulting in death to many of those toward whom this terrorism is directed, as that at Red River, that at New Orleans, that at Vicksburgh, and at other localities.

Then, too, we have the testimony of living witnesses officially before this tribunal, under the sanction of oath averring before us that the charge is true. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] reluctantly and under a sense of painful duty, told us the charge was true. The Senator from Texas, [Mr. FLANAGAN,] who has lived nearly seventy years with the people of the South, who has no ends to answer excepting fidelity to the country, tells us that the one-half has not been told. His colleague from the same State [Mr. HAMILTON] does not contradict him. The Senators from Arkansas and from Mississippi are here, and they have not yet risen to say that the allegation is false.

Then, sir, we have the testimony of General Sheridan, that brave and patriotic man, the hero of many a battle-field, whose name and memory will be cherished by the American people long after most of us are forgotten. He tells us, with all the directness and frankness of a soldier, that the atmosphere which his high duty compels him to breathe is filled with violence.

Sir, I have in my possession a compilation of hundreds of instances of violence, gathered from the public press, giving place and date and name; but I will not refer to them, because their use would be met with the assertion that they were mere newspaper stories; but which while uncontradicted cannot fail to add to the conviction that a system of violence does prevail.

And last of all, under the duty imposed by the Constitution upon the President to communicate to Congress from time to time information of the state of the Union, we have the deliberate statement of the Chief Magistrate that this allegation of outrage and wrong is true. Now, sir, it will not do to attempt to "whistle down the wind" a charge sustained by such proof.

This charge that a system of violence has existed and does exist should have been met by every Senator, without distinction of party, with an impartial and firm determination to know the truth, rather than by a cold and vacant denial. It should have been met by a united effort to exhaust the whole power of the nation to bring to speedy punishment these violators of law, rather than by justification, extenuation, and derision. One Senator tells us that the allegation is an insult to the people of his section; and I suppose that is to stop action when law is trampled under foot. He tells us that "only in rare and isolated instances" does violence occur.

Another Senator says:

I do not vindicate murder; I do not vindicate violation of law; but I hope that the people of all countries, including Louisiana, will never tamely submit like cravens and cowards to be oppressed without a show of resistance.

If, sir, there is any more craven and cowardly way of resisting even oppression than by assassination and murder, I have yet to learn it.

Another Senator attempts to hold the charge up to derision, and tells us "the outrage business is played out; that the people have heard that song until it fails to be music to their ears; that the republican party have an outrage-mill; and that these stories are part of their political machinery."

When such astounding statements of systematic violation of law as are presented here are thus met by Senators, no one should wonder at the saturnalia of crime. If the Senate and House with one voice and one heart should denounce these atrocities, and, casting party to the winds, let the world know that we were determined law should reign supreme, there would be order at the South in sixty days.

If this charge of violation of law be true and such things be tolerated, we see before us the ruin of this Republic. This system of organized crime may accomplish the partisan purpose to which it is directed; but it is yet true, as has been well said, that laws that are enrolled in the chancery of heaven cannot be repealed by any popular vote, and He who enacted them cannot be reached by any bribe or moved by any terror. In the violation of that simple law of right and wrong which is written in letters of light on the shrine of creation, and on all our hearts, you may read the downfall of the generations of nations that have figured upon earth. The crimes of the Roman republic were lost in the greater crimes of the empire, and both were ruined. The revolutions of France, the vibrations between anarchy and tyranny in the Greek republics, only prove that no matter what be the form, government cannot be maintained but by maintaining virtue.

Our fathers, when they laid the foundations of this nation, made a compromise with vice, and it well-nigh cost the life of the Republic. Too patriotic to inscribe upon the pages of their Constitution that word which is the sum of all iniquities; too logical, when establishing a government based on the equality of man, to recognize different grades of citizenship or civil privileges, they yet did tolerate slavery; and the result has been that for every tear-drop that in response to the lash of the task-master has trickled down the cheek of man, there has been demanded a drop of the heart's blood of the sons of those who thus struck hands with a great national wrong.

We should learn wisdom by experience. We have come to a national epoch. The rebellion is over; there has been enough of suffering and of torture; the storm is passed, but the current still runs strong. There are animosities, antagonisms, hostility; and the question for us is whether, come weal or woe, we will stand by the right, or whether we will suffer the Republic to drift away to that destruction which has met every nation that did not withstand the tide of vice.

The people of our country have inscribed on their Constitution three principles: universal freedom, universal suffrage, universal citizenship. There they are. They are the trophies of the war. To purchase them three hundred thousand young men, as good as any of us, lie to-day cold and stark in death. Time has brought its alleviations, but to-day thousands of hearts are shrouded in sorrow. We Senators at yonder rostrum have assumed the solemn obligation to do all we can to maintain and enforce in letter and in spirit those three great amendments of the Constitution. Has it been done? Is it being done? Is there a citizen of the North who would to-day be willing to live under such citizenship as the colored people of the South are subjected to? These are questions each Senator of right determines for himself. But if these amendments did not exist, how plain is the path of policy and of duty At the Revolution the population of the country was three million; it is now forty million. The number of the colored people to-day is four millions eight hundred thousand. I do not say that in a like period to that which has elapsed since the Revolution the colored population will amount to forty million; but I do say that they will amount to twenty million; and the question is, as a matter of mere public policy, aside from all constitutional amendments, whether they should be reasonably elevated, educated, and made a thrifty and industrious population, a blessing to themselves and to society, or whether they shall be an ignorant and degraded race, rising occasionally in revolt as the lingering sparks of manhood are fired by some new wrong—whether they shall rise to the dignity of creatures of God or become a mass of moral degradation pestilential to society.

Let us remember that the object of government is not to minister to the pride or to feed the luxury of men, but its true end is to elevate, refine, and humanize all who are brought under its influence. If we did not intend to give these people the rights of citizens, we should have left them slaves. If we did not intend to give them the protection of the law, we should have left them that protection which the lord gives his vassals. Look at their history. They were brought here by the cupidity of our fathers. They have been docile and obedient to law; they have not been pensioners upon our bounty. They have cleared our forests, reclaimed our morasses, and every year they bring $150,000,000 worth of cotton—the equivalent of gold—to the wealth of the nation. Without return they have supported in affluence a large portion of the people of this country. They have educated their children. They have helped to fight our battles. They are not indebted to us. And, sir, besides, it is the height of folly for a people to quarrel with its labor, for that is its wealth.

But all these plain and clear obligations of the Constitution, of duty, and of policy are met by one plea, which I have heard iterated and reiterated when each of the three amendments and when any law for its enforcement has been before the Senate, until the plea has become vapid and nauseating. That plea is, "We do not want social equality." That plea is a fraud or a delusion. There is not, there never has been, and never can be any such thing as social equality. The richest and most influential man in society cannot take a cup of tea with the poorest and humblest old lady in the country without her consent. Social relations depend upon reciprocal consent; they depend upon taste; they depend upon the affinities of the mind; they depend upon the arbitrary will of individuals, which no statute can control. Look at it, sir. The most uncouth, illiterate, degraded, and uninviting white men in the land, if not felons, have now and ever have had full and equal civil and political rights. Has this fact compelled anybody to associate with that class? Has it created social equality? No; on the contrary, in this country where we do not recognize any grades of citizenship, society has risen to a refinement, a culture, and an elevation that it has not attained in those lands where grades of citizenship are recognized. That plea is either a fraud or a delusion.

The people of the South had better not be deceived; for the people of this country intend that sooner or later there shall be equal citizenship here. They intend that the plea, "I am an American citizen," shall be respected in every nook and corner of the country just as much as it is upon the deck of a man-of-war. Do not be carried away by any ephemeral excitement; the rights of citizenship have cost too much ever to be surrendered. If this system of violence goes on at the South, you will see no political divisions at the North. Democrats are just as good men as republicans, and when they come to understand the situation will be as determined as republicans to have the law triumphant in this country. There are associations and traditions connected with the history of the three great amendments which appeal to the hearts of all our people. They will remember that the same blanket covered a lamented son and the colored soldier on the morass; that they shared their waning canteens together; that they bore for each other the last message of affection, and even bivouacked in death together; and our people will say: "We have submitted that those who have a chartered right to equal citizenship shall not have the full advantage of that public education they are taxed to support; we have submitted that when they travel they shall be thrust into the bunk or cattle car; we have submitted that they shall eat their rations at the curb-stone instead of the common inn; we have submitted that they shall be buried upon the roadside and not be permitted burial in that public grave-yard which they are taxed to maintain; but we will not submit that their lives be tortured by apprehension and terminated by violence." That will be the sentiment of the democrats and republicans at the North.

Be not deceived. In 1860 there were democratic leaders who sympathized with the then approaching rebellion. They told the South that there would be a divided North; that military forces would not be permitted to pass through certain States, and that there should be no coercion; but as soon as the old flag was fired upon, the rank and file of the democrats cast to the wind the pledges of their leaders, and manfully fought, and died, too, for their country. If the people of the South gets the impression from anything said here that there will be at the North any sympathy with or toleration of the system of violence, that seems to prevail at the South, they will be deceived.

A distinguished Senator said the other day that we should conciliate the South. Let me say to the Senators from Southern States that I remember that we have a common ancestry and measurably a common history, and I hope a common destiny. That I remember that they made a great mistake and have been disappointed; and while I am glad that they were, my American manhood forbids that I should ever exult over their disappointment. But, sir, let me say that I am opposed to any system of so-called "conciliation" because that is not to their advantage or the interest of the country. What we all want, and must have, is a government of law and equal citizenship everywhere. Conciliation! No, Mr. President; that administration of affairs which depends upon the will of the governed, and not on the will of the governing power, is not government. We want no jelly-fish system, that rests on conciliation; we want a government of bone and vertebræ, which does not "bear the sword in vain," which is a "terror to evil-doers." Let it be the sam in every section.

It has been eloquently and truly said that the hand which breaks down our laws is the hand of death unbarring the gates of pandemonium and letting loose upon the land the crimes and miseries of hell; and if the Most High should stand aloof and not cast a single ingredient into our cup of trembling, it would yet be one of insufferable woe; but He will not stand aloof.

Mr. President, the subject of the prevalence of crime and lawlessness at the South, and especially in Louisiana, and the supreme necessity of averting anarchy, constitutes the atmosphere through which alone you can correctly see and judge of those transactions of the 4th of January, which have excited the country. Sending Federal soldiers at all to a State which was peaceful, which was in a normal condition, would find no defenders on this side of the Chamber. Having the soldiery reinstate one government for another, as was done on the 14th of September, and which has met approval by the country, has only been approved because of the abnormal condition of society at New Orleans; and those utterances, here and elsewhere, which characterize the conduct of the General Government as if the theater of action had been in a peaceful State, where the law was supreme, where every citizen was a conservator of the peace, are a simple perversion of the true situation and calculated to weaken a government which every citizen of every party is bound to strengthen.

This much I wished to say: that those who wish to look at the transactions of the 4th of January as they really were may take a proper stand-point to view them.

I think the reflecting people of this country must be painfully impressed with the injustice that has been done to the President and to General Sheridan in this debate. The President, it is clear, has only been influenced by the most humane and patriotic motives. He called upon Congress for direction, and Congress in effect told him to recognize and to sustain the Kellogg government. He told us that he had recognized that government, and that he would continue to do so unless we directed to the contrary; and we were silent. He has, as a faithful man, done the best he could; and it seems to me that it is ungenerous and unjust to seek to excite toward him public prejudice or odium. Time and again, when massacre seemed to be impending, he has averted it.

As the 4th of January approached the whole country was filled with anxiety. The telegraph constantly informed us of the condition of affairs there; and when the day was passed without violence the nation was relieved. It was that modest, retiring, and indomitably brave man who has so often and so signally averted impending peril to his country who was the instrument to turn aside that threatened sorrow and disgrace. And to classify him with Napoleons, and Cæsars, and Cromwells, and oriental despots; to say to the country that he may yet fill the corridors of the Senate with troops to control legislation; to suggest that it may be necessary to refuse appropriations to the Army or disband it because he, of all men in this world, is unfit to be its commander, is ungenerous and unjust.

Mr. President, before considering the proceeding of the 4th of January, let me say a word as to the powers of this nation known as the United States of America. The democratic party up to 1860 had so cultivated and distorted beyond proportion the doctrine of State rights that their theories culminated in James Buchanan's sending, on the 4th of December of that year, a message to Congress, stating that after serious reflection he had arrived at the conclusion that Congress had no power to coerce a State which attempted to withdraw from the Union. The erroneous theories culminated in that message, but the baneful effects of that doctrine can only be arrived at by estimating the blood and treasure the doctrine of State rights has cost the country. From the State-rights stand-point it is difficult to discover what the military can lawfully do. No, Mr. President, this is a nation, and not a general agency of thirty-seven independent sovereign States. By the Constitution the States are denuded of many of the incidents of sovereign power. They can of themselves make no agreement or treaty with other States. They can have no foreign relations. They can have no army or navy, and even the militia, when in service, is under the control of the Federal Government. The States, by the surrender of these powers, would be unable to maintain their organization against insurrection from within and invasion from without. The great common power to which the States look for protection from domestic violence and foreign invasion is the United States.

All the power which the United States possesses in this regard is set forth in the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution. The provision is brief, but contains vast powers. The United States Government guarantees three things to the several States, in consideration of their having surrendered the incidents of sovereignty. It guarantees to them government, security, order. It guarantees to the States government. This the United States is to see that each State has, whether the Legislature or the governor of the State ask the interference or not.

Every State is interested that there should be government in each. The relations of the States are so intimate that anarchy in one would be to the injury of all; and besides, as the citizens of the several States are citizens of the United States, they have a right that anarchy shall not exist in any. Then, too, the United States has a system of laws and government extending into each State, and its laws and government cannot be enforced in the State that is in a condition of anarchy, and the obligation is on the United States to see to it that anarchy does not exist anywhere; and this whether the governor or the Legislature make a call or not.

The United States, whether the Legislature or governor ask it or not, whether they like it or not, is also to protect the several States from invasion. All are interested that the State should not be devastated by a foreign foe. All the citizens of the United States are interested in this, because as citizens of the United States they have rights, property, and privileges in the State to be protected. And the United States of its own motion is to afford this security.

The United States is to do one thing more, on the application of the Legislature or governor. The State having surrendered its rights to an army or navy, the United States is to render its aid in protecting from domestic violence.

Now, who is the United States? Is it the executive, or is it the judiciary, or is it Congress? It is all combined, and it is each of these three branches acting separately within its constitutional province. The Government which the United States guarantees is to be republican in form. Should a State pass a law tending to create an aristocracy, as that the judgeship should be hereditary, it would be the duty of the judiciary to declare that law void; and in that case, fulfilling this guarantee, the judiciary is "the United States." If all government in a State should be broken down, as after the rebellion, so that it became necessary to organize new governments, then the legislative power acts, and Congress is "the United States." If there is domestic violence in a State and the President is called upon by the Legislature or the governor to suppress it, he fulfills the guarantee, and he, acting in his province, is "the United States."

Mr. President, a republican government is not only one in which the representatives elected by the people govern, but is one in which the succession or continuance of organized authority shall be in accordance with the law of the land. That is quite as essential to a republican government as that the governing representatives shall be elected by the people. If by fraud or force, or both combined, this succession or continuance of organized authority according to law is interfered with, and the sovereign power is seized by intruders, that is a subversion of government and so is a subversion of a republican form of government, and the United States by that branch of the Government to which the duty appropriately belongs may interfere.

The highest and most atrocious breach of the peace, the most disastrous domestic violence, is that which prevents the lawful succession or continuance of organized authority.

It is worse than murder, rapine, or arson, because it strikes at the heart of government. If the usurper of power at the imminent moment the transfer or succession of government is being made can, by stratagem, by a coup d'état, wrest it from those designated by law, what folly is it to have armies to protect lawful government! For why should usurpers ever peril their lives to get that power which they can get by seizing, stealing, thieving? Why clothe sovereign power with a coat of mail, if you leave a joint in the harness open where the spear of the usurper may reach the very heart of government?

Let the United States Senate be careful that in its commendable hostility to the interference of the military with the civil authority it does not give countenance to the much more dangerous enemies to civil authority. The usurper of civil authority, whether by force or fraud, is entitled to no sympathy whether their treason be arrested by civil or by military agency; and the State that is delivered from the usurpation has suffered no wrong.

Unless we are careful, this nation with its thirty-seven State Legislatures may by our defense of those who through stratagem attempt to seize the government of Louisiana do greater injury to civil liberty than could ever in this land be done by the military power.

Mr. President, the military power of this country in the hands of the people is but that of a mouse under the paw of a lion. In countries where the people have little power, and where they are not the rulers, and where there are large standing armies, there may be danger from military power; and is it not true that the perils and dangers to civil liberty which there exist have been adroitly and skillfully transferred by some debaters to this country. It seems to me that I can hear the brave man of the West laugh at the idea of twenty-five thousand solders a few months from the people imperiling the liberties of their country! There is much of affectation in this pretense of danger to liberty from our Army. I think the trumpet has given in this case an uncertain sound.

Now, Mr. President, I have a few words to say in reference to the 4th of January. Remember the state of partisan feeling at New Orleans, as manifested by the murders and assassinations that had occurred. Remember that within ninety days an armed band of insurgents had overturned the government of the State of Louisiana; that they had shot down the police and trampled under foot the civil authorities; that they had murdered in the streets fifty citizens; that the governor himself only saved his life by fleeing to the custom-house. Remember that this insurrection was held in abeyance, but had not been exterminated; that it was like a subterranean fire that had been stamped out at one point, but was ready to burst out at another at any minute.

As that day approached, these insurgents had a definite purpose and definite plan for accomplishing their purpose.

Their purpose was at the imminent moment, when the sovereign power was being transmitted from one set of representatives to another, to seize the reins of government by stratagem and by force, and thus overturn a government which had been recognized by the courts of the State and by the Federal courts, by the Congress of the United States, by the President, which had existed for two years, and which this same party had within ninety days successfully seized, but were not suffered by the Federal Government acting through the military power to hold. That this was their purpose is manifest; first, by what occurred on the 4th of January, of which hereafter; second, by what McMillan, who was elected to the United States Senate by the McEnery legislature, told Mr. Foster, one of the committee which went to New Orleans. While sitting in the legislative hall, McMillan told him that their plan was that the newly-elected senators were to join themselves with those who claimed to be elected to the senate in 1872, and thus they would have the senate. They were then to obtain the house of representatives in the manner we shall see; and that then the two houses would recognize McEnery as governor. Thus a revolution formerly attempted by force and defeated with the approbation of the whole country was to be effected by stratagem.

I am much mistaken if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] the other day did not say in the Senate that if that Legislature had not been driven out, Kellogg would not have been governor for an hour. The purpose was by a coup d'état to effect that which they had failed to effect by arms and by bloodshed, and some of the people are thrown into a convulsion of excitement when this purpose fails. If the revolutionary stratagem had succeeded and been tolerated, it would have been a lamentable precedent for anarchy in a country where there are thirty-seven such legislative bodies, where power is annually succeeding from one set of representatives to another.

Now, how were the insurgents to get possession of the Legislature? The senate was to be easily managed. The democratic senators did not join their associates, but staid out of the senate to join the democratic members elected in 1872, when the house should have been secured.

How was the control of the house to be obtained? The plan of the insurgents and the outrageous violation of law are sufficiently manifested by a statement of the law and by what they did. There were two ways, and only two, by which any person could become a member of the Legislature—by his being named on the roll prepared by the clerk of the former house or by his being declared to be a member of the Legislature after it had been organized. Those are the only two possible ways in which any one can be a member of the Legislature of Louisiana. The statute that regulates this subject is the twenty-fourth section of the act of November 20, 1872, which declares in these words—

> That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly; and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate respectively; and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provision, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.
> Nothing in this act shall be construed to conflict with article 34 of the constitution.

Let us see if there is anything in the act interfering with the thirty-fourth article of the constitution. The thirty-fourth article of the constitution provides that—

> Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualification, election, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

The act of 1872, you see, does not conflict with the constitution, but affirms it. The constitution says that none but the house shall determine the qualifications and elections of members. There was no house when this action was taken; there had been no organization. But the constitution further provides that the manner in which a contest shall be conducted shall be prescribed by law; and the law of 1872 does provide the manner, and expressly says that none, no matter whether in fact elected or not, unless their names appear upon the roll which is made out by the returning board and sent to the secretary of state and given by him to the clerk, shall take part in the organization of the house.

There were one hundred and two members on the roll who answered to their names; fifty-two, a majority of them, were republicans; fifty were democrats. By no possibility could that house under a party vote have had other than a republican organization. That was one of the difficulties the conspirators had to contend with.

There was another difficulty. The law provided that the clerk of the previous house should hold over, in the language of the act, "to facilitate the organization of the new house," and should hold over, as the act says, "until a clerk shall have been elected and qualified to succeed him." The former clerk, then, was the representative head of that assemblage of persons returned to the Legislature. It was he who should call the roll; it was he who was to preside until the house was organized by the election of a speaker. The language of the act is this:

> That, for the purpose of facilitating the organization of their respective bodies, the secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives shall hold over and continue in office from one term of the General Assembly to another until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

These laws were set at defiance.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I desire the Senator to state whether under that law there was any authority for the election of what is called a temporary chairman or speaker to organize the house?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly there was not; because there was an express provision of law that the clerk of the former house should hold over until his successor was appointed, for the purpose, in the language of the act, of "facilitating the organization of the house."

Mr. MORTON. I will ask the Senator still further if he understands the operation of that law and the practice of legislative bodies to be that the clerk himself is to act as the presiding officer until the organization is complete.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly understand that the clerk is to preside until a speaker was elected.

Mr. President, these laws were set at defiance. The clerk was in his chair performing the duty of organization when a member usurped his duty. Mr. Billieu nominated Mr. Wiltz as temporary chairman. Billieu put the motion, which he had no more right to do than I had. He declared the motion carried and Wiltz elected. You, sir, might with equal authority have pronounced that judgment. There never was a grosser usurpation. Wiltz was not elected chairman of that house for these three reasons: First, because Billieu had no right to put the motion, or decide the vote; second, because he refused to call the yeas and nays. Mr. Foster told me that the demand for the yeas and nays was made. The constitution, by the thirty-sixth article, provides that "each house of the General Assembly shall keep and publish weekly a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question, at the desire of two of them, shall be entered on the journal." A clerk was to hold over to keep the journal. There is the constitutional provision. There was a demand for the yeas and nays and there was a refusal. Wiltz was not elected the chairman of that house for the further reason that there were fifty-two men there opposed to him, as we have the right to infer, and not more than fifty in favor of him.

Mr. BOGY. I will ask the Senator if Mr. Billieu was a member of the Legislature, that is, one of the persons whose names were on the list furnished by the former clerk?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand he was one of those.

Mr. BOGY. If he was a member, it was according to the usage.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If he was elected a member of the Legislature, he was not elected speaker, and he undertook to perform the province of speaker by putting a motion and declaring that motion carried, and that too when another, provided by law, was presiding and when the motion was not carried.

Mr. BOGY. Did the law to which the Senator alludes authorize the clerk to put motions to the vote of that body? The law, if I understand it, only made it the duty of the clerk to call the roll of the members. It is the usage in the Western States—I know it is in my State—for a member whose name has been called to nominate a person, and he puts the question to the members whose names have been recognized as members, and it is not put by the clerk.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator from Missouri had done me the honor to listen to what I said, he would have understood my view.

Mr. BOGY. I will state to the Senator that I have listened to his speech with great attention and great pleasure, because I think he is making a very able speech indeed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The law expressly provided that the clerk should be continued over for the very purpose of facilitating the organization; that he should remain clerk until his successor was elected; that is, remain clerk until a speaker had been elected and they proceed to the election of a clerk. It would be a strange arrangement for the organization of legislative bodies if it was the province of one hundred and two men whose names were on the roll each to put a motion, each one to say "It is carried," and possibly have one hundred and two different results. That would be an organization into chaos!

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that at the time that man made the motion to elect Wiltz as temporary chairman none of them had been sworn in by the clerk?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not one. None of them were sworn in before the republicans left in any other manner than according to Dr. Franklin's plan of asking a blessing upon the whole barrel of pork. They were not sworn in, as I understand, otherwise than by Wiltz declaring them to be sworn.

But, Mr. President, let us proceed. What use is there in raising a question whether Billieu had a right to put a motion or not, when the constitution provided that they should call the yeas and nays when they were demanded, and when they were refused and refused just because there was a majority against the motion?

Immediately on Wiltz's taking the chair, Mr. Trezevan was declared elected clerk. There was yet no permanent organization of the house. Then Mr. Billieu again moved that five persons who claimed to be elected, but whose names had not been placed upon the roll, should be sworn in as members; and this by the usurping speaker was declared carried. Another demand for the yeas and nays was made, and it was refused. They were not members of that house because they were not on the roll, and there was no house organized which could admit them. What a farce to say that five members who claimed contested seats could be admitted when there was no house organized, no committee appointed, nobody to look at the testimony, to look at the credentials, and when the law of the State expressly said that they should not be admitted until after there was an organization. What a farce to pretend that these men were members of that house when the person who put the motion expressly refused to call the yeas and nays, and when we have a right to infer that there were fifty-two against their admission and only fifty in favor of it.

Then, sir, we have this case: Here are five persons assuming without authority to exercise the sovereign power of the State of Louisiana; fifty democrats join with them, making fifty-five, which changes the political complexion of the house, there thus being fifty-five democrats and fifty-two republicans, and thus by this legerdemain those men who had been defeated in their revolutionary project, with the approval of the country, by the Army of the United States, on the 14th of September, have subverted that government and placed themselves in the seat of power. The case is like this: Say there were seventy-one Senators of the United States and three vacancies; of the seventy-one, thirty-six were democrats and thirty-five were republican, and suppose that the republican members should come into this Chamber with three men and should apply to the Vice-President to put a motion that those three men be admitted as Senators and sworn, and he refusing some republican rises in his seat, puts the motion, and declares it carried. If some Senator objects and demands the yeas and nays, the demand is refused. The motion is declared carried and these three men are admitted. Now, the republicans would have the majority, they having thirty-eight members and the democrats but thirty-six. That is the case before us. It is revolution. Suppose, to make the case nearer parallel, that the same republican party within ninety days had by open violence by an army of ten thousand men in the streets of Washington attempted to subvert this Government; that they had made a democratic President flee to the house of some friend to protect his life; that they had stricken down fifty men in the streets; would this not make the atrocity more apparent, if not more aggravated? That is this case.

Mr. President, the grave allegation which has fired the American heart that the Federal soldiery have driven five members of the Legislature of Louisiana from the legislative hall wants the essential ingredient of fact and truth. They were not members of the Legislature. They were only members of a conspiracy to subvert the government. Are they to remain there? If they are, it is a successful rebellion against lawful authority. They must be removed; but how? Had they shot five republicans in their seats, then it would have been proper, I suppose all will admit, to have removed the five intruders by force.

But we are told they used no violence. Ah! Mr. President, if I drop the arsenic into the cup of my associate I use no particular violence, but the result is death. So these men used the violence necessary to accomplish the conspiracy intended to be to that government, ay, and to many of the people, death. And such would have been the result had their purpose not been averted. They committed violence upon the rights of the people of Louisiana. It was their right that the continuing clerk should facilitate the organization of the house until his successor was elected. It was their right that a majority and not a minority should speak for the body. It was their right that every decision should only be made by a call of the yeas and nays when they were demanded. It was their right that none but those on the roll should take part in the organization. They used violence enough. But how are they to be removed? Shall the sergeant-at-arms remove them? He and his associates seem to have been, by previous arrangement, parties to the lawless proceeding. And, besides, there is no sergeant-at-arms to an assemblage not organized.

As those who sought to subvert the government had invoked the military power to sustain themselves, shall Governor Kellogg seek the aid of that power?

I am opposed to the interference of the military power with civil authority in time of peace. But those who were removed were not clothed with civil authority; they were intruders; they were attempting themselves unlawfully to wrest civil authority from those to whom the law gave it; and it was not a time of peace. The fires of insurrection which time and again had broken forth were only slumbering; and if their conspiracy had been successful, it would no doubt again have brought devastation and death.

I am opposed to any intervention of the military power which might even be perverted into a precedent in other times and under other circumstances.

The question is whether Governor Kellogg, following the example of his adversaries, was authorized to seek the aid of the military, and that is all the question before us or before the people. In answer to that question I will ask another, and end my remarks on this subject. Let me ask who is there here, had he been chief magistrate of Louisiana intrusted with the solemn duty of preserving the government of that State, of preserving its peace, of preserving the lives of its citizens—who, seeing now that that government has been preserved, that peace has been preserved, that the lives of the citizens have been protected—who is there who would to-day take the responsibility of undoing, were it possible, what was done at that critical moment? I would not take that responsibility.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, my only apology for occupying any portion of the time of the Senate to-day is the importance of the subject brought to our attention by the resolution now under consideration. I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any defense of the democratic party, which has been arraigned by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. I have regard and attachment for the party to which I belong, and on all proper occasions shall be ready to enter upon its defense and meet any accusation that may be made against it. But, sir, the relative claims to public confidence of the great parties of this country have recently been submitted to the judgment of the country. Upon the judgment which has been rendered the democratic party is willing to stand. I have no doubt that every accusation which has been brought against that party in this debate by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] has been repeated time and again in every portion of the States they represent; and the reiteration of those charges here is simply the repetition of what has been alleged before their constituencies over and over again. They were made prior to the late election, and failed to have their effect upon the very communities with which these Senators are most particularly acquainted, and I doubt not that they will be wholly unable to reverse the verdict which was rendered in November last against the party to which they belong. It is therefore unnecessary that I should enter into any defense of the democratic party or attempt to repel any of the charges and accusations that have been brought against it in this debate.

But, sir, it was ingenious on the part of our friends, it was eminently ingenious on the part of the Senator who immediately preceded me [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to enter into these allegations against the democratic party, to recount again the story of wrongs which they repeated at the hustings in order to divert public attention from the great public crime that has been committed in the invasion of the legislative halls of one of the States of this Union. I have no doubt that the purpose, the object, the intent in bringing these railing accusations against the democratic party, which has ever been the conservator of peace and the defender of the Constitution of the country, was if possible to counteract the effect which the recent military interference in Louisiana has had upon the public mind. But, sir, I apprehend it will not have that effect. In my judgment the people of this country look at this question calmly and dispassionately. It is not a question which they can lightly contemplate or from which they can be diverted by partisan appeals. Throughout this broad land the people seem to apprehend the fact—I hope not too late—that their liberties are in danger. I am not surprised that there has been a profound impression made upon the public mind by what took place in New Orleans on the 4th instant. It would have been surprising if there had not been a public feeling of indignation elicited by the great wrong that has been done. I do not regret that there has been a general dissatisfaction and protest against this crime of greatest magnitude. The conduct of the military authorities, under whosesoever order they may have acted, strikes at public liberty, strikes at the very foundation of our system of republican government; and unless the people of this country were prepared to give up their liberties, it should not be a matter of surprise that they regard such action with indignation and alarm.

I am not surprised that there has been protest in this Senate; I am not surprised that there has been in this Chamber vehement denunciation of the action of the military authorities and of those under whose orders and direction they acted; but I regret exceedingly that that condemnation has come almost exclusively from this side of the Chamber. I regret that our republican friends have not joined with us in denunciation against this great wrong. I regret it, because I believe it would greatly have aided in putting a stop to such military interference with the organization and existence of State Legislatures. It would have been a sublime spectacle to have witnessed a united Senate upon a great question like this, involving the very existence of the rights of the States of this Union. It would have been a sublime spectacle, when the liberties of the country had been invaded, if this Senate with a united voice had put the seal of condemnation upon it. I regret, therefore, that our friends on the other side of the Chamber have felt it their duty to make this a party question. Sir, it is not in itself a party question. There was nothing connected with this act on the morning of the 5th of January which properly made it a party question. The rights of a sovereign State had been trampled under the foot of the military power of this country; and when that news reached this Chamber there was nothing in the question that ought for a moment to have given it a party coloring. It was true that this military interference had taken place during the existence of a republican Administration. It was true also that the Executive, if we can believe the telegram of the Secretary of War, had given it his approval. Nevertheless that was not obligatory upon Senators on this floor. Notwithstanding that invasion had taken place under an Administration to which they had adhered, and notwithstanding the President may have been so unfortunate as in an unguarded moment to have given it his approbation and to have authorized the sending of a telegram to General Sheridan by the Secretary of War saying "that the President and all of us approve your conduct," still, though the President may have thus become committed to this act, no member of the Senate was so committed. The military interference was an exceptional act, one that could not have been anticipated in the regular and orderly administration of the Government. Therefore, when the question came here on the morning of the 5th of January, I repeat, there was nothing binding upon any member of either side of this House to approve or justify it in any particular. I regret that Senators in the presence of such danger to liberty, that Senators on the other side of the Chamber when they were made aware of the fact that the legislative halls of a sovereign State had been invaded by the military power and the legislative department of the government of that State interfered with, did not rise at once above all party feeling and unite with us in the condemnation of an act so perilous and wrong in itself. Sir, what would have been the action of the men who preceded us in this Chamber in such an hour? Suppose such action had occurred in the days when Webster and Clay and Clayton and Cass were here? Unless I have greatly misunderstood their character and their devotion to free institutions, their condemnation would have been prompt, emphatic, and determined.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator; I simply wish to ask him for permission, as we are approaching the usual hour of adjournment, to move for a recess to seven or seven and a half o'clock, or any hour that will be agreeable to him. Or would he prefer to go on now?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator that I wish to accommodate myself to the pleasure of the Senate. I should be glad to have spoken at an earlier hour of the day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is a feeling in the Senate that the debate ought to go on this evening in order to accommodate any Senators who may desire to speak. I will only make the motion in case the Senator from Delaware assents. If he desires to go on now, I shall have no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether there is a determination to close this matter to-morrow?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the Senator from Maine has given notice that he intends to move to take up the legislative appropriation bill on Monday, and that has precedence not only by right, but by parliamentary usage. He has given us notice to that effect twice. I suggest a recess to promote the convenience of those who wish to speak; but if the Senator from Delaware prefers to go on now, I will withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield for the purpose indicated?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield, that whatever is agreeable to the Senate may be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose it is understood that the evening is exclusively for debate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is within ten minutes of the time fixed for the recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; if the Senator does not wish to go on till the evening, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion for a moment the Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill for the purpose of reference.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4324) to authorize the change of the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] upon which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I perceive that the Senate is very thin, not a quorum of Senators being present; and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn, and it was declared not to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result having been announced, the Chair thinks it is too late to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After debate, the motion can be made again in a minute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when I gave way for the motion to take a recess this afternoon, I was trying to impress upon the Senate and upon the country this fact, that there was no occasion whatever, when this question first came to the Senate, for making it a party question. I was trying to show that the members of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber were not responsible for this act of the military power of this Government, that they could not reasonably have anticipated that any such act as interference with the existence of the Legislature of Louisiana would have taken place during the administration with which they are connected.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator yield? I again move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I give way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, it was announced that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. MERRIMON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know, as I was not in——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order on a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide whether the Senator from Ohio is in order until he states his proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing is in order on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator perhaps loses something by objecting to my being heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to know whether there was any understanding among Senators that we were to proceed now, or whether the recess was simply taken by a mere vote. That question will govern my vote on this motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know myself. I was not in when the recess was ordered, and I have no information on that topic.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I have to say that in my judgment if Senators will not pay the Senator who has the floor the respect of coming to hear him, his friends are perfectly justified in adjourning the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. If there was any understanding, I think it might be stated as the understanding that the session this evening was for debate alone; that no business would be transacted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say this: I had taken the floor and spoken about ten minutes when the Senator from Ohio, not now in his seat, [Mr. SHERMAN,] asked me whether I would give way for a recess. I hesitated; I certainly was reluctant to do so; but feeling the delicacy of the position of a gentleman in regard to forcing himself on the attention of Senators, after manifesting some reluctance to it, I did consent to allow a motion to be made providing that a recess be taken. I wish to say, in reference to the remark of the Senator from Ohio, who is not in his seat, that he would not press the motion without my consent, that I gave way because I feel a delicacy in pressing myself upon the attention of Senators at any time, and I do not care now particularly about the attention of Senators to hear anything I have to say.

But whenever there is a motion made on the other side of the House, when I am speaking on the floor, that I shall give way for a recess, and I yield to their suggestions, I think there is something due to myself that they should be present at least and not manifest entire indifference to the discussion. I do not make speeches to the galleries. That is not my sphere. Whatever speeches I make for outside use are made to my own constituency; and so far as I am concerned, I could go on now and make a speech that would be read by my immediate constituents as well as if the Senate were full. I shall yield to the pleasure of the Senate now whether I shall go on or whether I shall be allowed to wait until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina insist on his motion to adjourn?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the roll-call will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope, by unanimous consent, I may be permitted to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Vermont will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to know what are the wishes of the Senator from Delaware upon this subject. The Senate is aware that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations gave notice that on Monday morning we must proceed with the appropriation bills, and therefore this subject will have to be disposed of, as it now stands, to-morrow; and with the press of matters to-morrow, and the other gentlemen who may desire to speak, I should be glad to know, before I vote, what the wishes of the Senator from Delaware are, in view of the pressure there will be upon our time to-morrow in respect of the other gentlemen upon his side and upon this side of the Chamber who may desire to be heard.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am sure that question need not have been asked by the Senator from Vermont. I do not think it necessary that I should express any preference. The other day a gentleman on the other side obtained the floor at four o'clock and desired an adjournment to the next day that he might make a speech. I have said enough to indicate my views in saying that I reluctantly yielded to what seemed to be the wish of some Senators this afternoon. I would much have preferred concluding my speech, and I said so to my friends around me, rather than have to come here this evening; but I certainly prefer to make a speech to the Senate and not to empty benches. I am in the hands of the Senate; they have placed me in this predicament; I shall not place myself out of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALLISON answered to his name by voting in the affirmative.

Mr. GORDON. If I can say a word by unanimous consent——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair hears no objection.

Mr. GORDON. I simply wish to say to those Senators who are present that if it should appear to-morrow that more Senators wish to speak than can be heard, it would be proper to agree that this debate should be prolonged till the close of Monday's session at least. I am anxious to be heard once more; I think it necessary that I should be heard; and yet there are a number of Senators here who have already indicated to the Senate and to the Chair their desire to speak, and I am satisfied those who wish to speak cannot all be heard to-morrow. I shall yield to others rather than intrude myself, though I am very anxious to be heard once more on this question.

Mr. WINDOM. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations being absent, being a member of that committee myself, I desire to say that I am confident he intends to press the appropriation bills on Monday. We have twelve appropriation bills yet to pass, and it will be necessary to bring them to the attention of the Senate and press action on them. I am quite sure he would not consent to any arrangement of the kind now proposed, and I shall have to object to it in his absence.

Mr. SCOTT. Having stated what I understood to have been the impression of the Senate when it took the recess, I do not wish to be construed as having any desire that the Senator from Delaware shall go on to-night against his wishes But the recess having been ordered for the very purpose of permitting a larger number of Senators to address the Senate on the question now pending than could otherwise have addressed it in a view of the notice given by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I supposed every Senator who attended to-night came with that expectation, and that the understanding that the session was only for debate would have its effect upon the attendance. Certainly those of us who came with the expectation of listening to the Senator from Delaware are guilty of no disrespect to him, but are rather disappointed if we shall not be permitted to hear him. But if he says he does not desire to go on, those who wish to speak will have to take the consequences if the time is shortened by their absence.

Mr. THURMAN. Go on with the roll-call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Clayton, Cooper, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, Ransom, Scott, Sprague, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Washburn, West, and Wright—59.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before announcing the result of the vote, the Chair will state that at the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow the resolution proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be taken up as the unfinished business, and upon that the Senator from Delaware will be entitled to the floor. Upon the motion to adjourn the yeas are 14, and the nays none; so the motion prevails, and the Senate stands adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The Senate thereupon (at seven o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 15, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FREEDMAN'S BANK—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY FOR GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DURHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report two bills—one a bill (H. R. No. 4322) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes; and the other a bill (H. R. No. 4323) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to buy certain property for the use of the Government of the United States. The first of these bills is accompanied with reports and exhibits of the sub-committee upon the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company. I desire to have these bills printed and recommitted.

Mr. BROMBERG. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. I shall object unless on that condition.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask, then, unanimous consent that Monday the 25th instant, after the States have been called, be set for the consideration of these bills.

Mr. BROMBERG. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I must reserve a point of order with reference to one of those bills—that providing for the purchase of buildings.

The SPEAKER. Neither bill can be reported for consideration without unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to object with reference to the other bill—that relating to the Freedman's Bank.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to both.

The SPEAKER. Then all the gentleman can do is to have the bills printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

There being no objection, the bills were reported, read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. SESSIONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4324) to change the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SESSIONS. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I ask that it be put on its passage at once.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York, be changed to the City National Bank of Jamestown, New York, provided the board of directors of the bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board and cause a copy of such resolution duly authenticated to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency within six months after the passage of the act; all expenses of the change, including that of printing and engraving, to be paid by the bank.

The second section provides that all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York, shall devolve upon and inure to the City National Bank of Jamestown, New York, whenever such change of name is effected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this simply a change of the name of a bank?

Mr. SESSIONS. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not of location?

Mr. SESSIONS. No, sir; not at all.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SESSIONS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEYS OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back without amendment the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed one thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the subject of the geographical and geological surveys of the Territories west of the Mississippi; five hundred copies to be for the use of the Department of the Interior, and five hundred copies for the use of the War Department.

IRRIGATION.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back the following resolution, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the House of Representatives five thousand copies of the report of the commissioners of irrigation appointed under act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for a board of commissioners to report a system of irrigation for the San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys in California," approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. DONNAN. The amendment reported from the committee is to strike out "five" and insert "three," so it will read "three thousand copies."

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back the following resolution, with amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the documents transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives, relative to the mode of examining and allowing claims by foreign governments be, and are ordered to be, printed under the direction of the Clerk of the House, who is hereby directed to cause translations to be made into the English language of so much of said documents as are in foreign languages; and that additional copies of said documents be, and are hereby, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DONNAN. Now report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "documents," in line 9, insert the words "relating to the subject aforesaid."

Strike out all after the word "languages," in the ninth line, as follows: "Of so much of said documents as are in foreign languages, and that additional copies of said documents be and are ordered to be printed."

Mr. DONNAN. It will be seen by the House that the first amendment restricts translations to the subject-matter only; that is, as to the manner of paying claims by foreign governments; and the second amendment strikes out the extra copies, as it is believed the usual number of copies will be sufficient.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the confusion I did not exactly understand what this resolution is about.

Mr. DONNAN. It refers to a series of reports sent to the Secretary of State and to the Committee on War Claims, relating to the method of payment of claims by foreign governments.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the request is only to print the usual number of copies.

Mr. DONNAN. We strike out the provision for extra copies.

The amendments were severally agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports of a private nature are first in order from the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHARLES MARKLEIN.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1745) for the relief of Charles Marklein, late sutler of the One hundred and Seventy-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

LYDIA BENJAMIN.

Mr. ALBRIGHT also, from the same committee, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Lydia Benjamin, widow of David Benjamin; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

J. W. DREW.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3873) for the relief of J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster United States Army, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States to allow to J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster United States Army, in the settlement of his accounts for the months of November and December, 1868, the sum of $20,319.88 for disbursements made on vouchers lost in transmission.

The amendments reported from the committee are as follows:

Line 8 strike out the word "the" and insert "such sum as he may show not exceeding the."

Line 10 before the word "lost" insert "alleged to have been."

And add the following proviso:

Provided, That such accounting officers shall be satisfied such disbursements were made, and in determining the same secondary evidence may be received.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this matter must first be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This bill does not require any appropriation of money from the Treasury. If the gentleman will hear the report read he will see such is the case. The evidence shows that this money is in the Treasury in favor of this party and that no additional appropriation is required to be made.

The SPEAKER. The point being made, the Chair will be compelled to sustain it. The bill directs an allowance to this paymaster of $20,319.88.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The evidence shows that this money is already in the Treasury in favor of this paymaster, and the bill does not provide for making any additional appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules this is one of the bills which is required to have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 3949) authorizing the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3599) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DANIEL S. MERSHON, JR.

Mr. HAYS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 210) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr., and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely on the following; and the same were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) providing for an inquiry into the condition of the United States Navy; and

The bill (S. No. 745) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the following; and they were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of Mary Sleigle;

The petition of James W. Huff;

The case of Thomas Willse;

The bill (H. R. No. 2835) granting a pension to Priscilla Griffith;

The petition of Ann W. Osborn, for a pension;

The bill (H. R. No. 1864) granting arrears of pension to A. S. Howard;

The bill (H. R. No. 2905) granting a pension to Francis Armstrong;

The petition of Margaret R. Clune;

The bill (H. R. No. 696) granting a pension to Alice Mullaly, mother of John Mullaly, Company C, Second Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers; and

The bill (H. R. No. 1836) granting a pension to Thomas J. Acra.

WILLIAM R. DUNCAN.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4325) granting a pension to William R. Duncan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL P. EVANS.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4326) granting a pension to Samuel P. Evans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. GODFREY HUNTER.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4327) granting a pension to W. Godfrey Hunter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGET LEAFFY.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4328) granting a pension to Bridget Leaffy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. SMALL.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4329) granting a pension to William H. Small; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL C. COOPER.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Samuel C. Cooper; and the same was laid on the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CYPHERT G. GILLETTE.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4330) granting a pension to Cyphert G. Gillette; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH ANN CROSBY.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4331) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Crosby; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following cases:

The petition of George Young and others;

The bill (H. R. No. 2007) granting a pension to Luther C. French, late assistant surgeon Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteers;

The petition of Charles A. Overfelt; and

The petition of O. M. Ball.

FANNIE E. RECORDS.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4332) granting a pension to Fannie E. Records, widow of Albert B. Records; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES ROUNSFELL.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4333) granting a pension to James Rounsfell, private in Company K, One hundredth New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM T. SIMMS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H.

R. No. 4334) granting a pension to William T. Simms; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY C. TOY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3884) granting a pension to Mary C. Toy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOUIS C. CHASE.

Mr. EAMES, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1350) to enable Louis C. Chase to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for an improvement in buckles; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. CHRISTIANA L. WILLIAMS.

Mr. EAMES also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 4202) to enable Mrs. Christiana L. Williams, administratrix of the estate of C. W. Williams, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for improvements in canal locks and gates.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EAMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANN JENNETTE HATHAWAY.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1317) to enable Ann Jennette Hathaway, executrix of the last will and testament of Joshua Hathaway, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for improved device for converting reciprocating into rotary motion.

The bill was read. It provides that Ann Jennette Hathaway, as executrix of the last will and testament of Joshua Hathaway, deceased, of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to Joshua Hathaway for improved device for converting reciprocating into rotary motion under date of April 3, 1860, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which said letters-patent are granted; such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the aforesaid original term of said patent. And upon such application, so filed, the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner, upon giving the same notice, and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of said patent had not expired, should the same expire before he has reasonable time to inquire into the facts and make his decision; provided that no person shall be held liable for the infringement of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent and prior to the date of its extension.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. There is a report, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There ought to be some explanation of that bill.

The Clerk read the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN HAZLETINE.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4335) authorizing John Hazletine to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of his patent on a new and useful water-wheel; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Commissioner of Patents, on due application made therefor, may extend the patent of John Hazletine for the further time of seven years from and after the passage of the act, and that the said patent so extended shall have the same effect in law as if originally granted for the term for which it shall be so extended; provided that the patentee shall have no right to damages from any parties who may have infringed on said patent between the expiration of the original patent and the extension.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I would like to have some explanation in reference to that bill.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. The case is a very clear one; let the report be read.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HALE, of New York. When did this patent expire?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. About three years ago. This man has been before Congress during all that time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. He has been diligent, then?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He has.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RUDOLF EICKEMEYER.

Mr. EAMES, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3924) to enable Rudolf Eickemeyer to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for a machine for stitching linings into hats.

The bill grants leave to Rudolf Eickemeyer, of Yonkers, in the State of New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to him for a machine for stitching linings into hats, of date the 9th day of August, 1859, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which said letters-patent were granted, such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the aforesaid original term of said patent; and upon such application, so filed, the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of said patent had not expired: Provided, That no person shall be held liable for the infringment of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent and prior to the date of its extension.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following:

And that such application shall be made to the Commissioner of Patents within ninety days from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read; setting forth that letters-patent were granted to Rudolf Eickemeyer August 9, 1859, for a machine which is adapted only for stitching linings into hats; the patent expired on August 9, 1873. The law relative to extensions of letters-patent requires that applications be filed not more than six months nor less than sixty days prior to the expiration of the patent. The petition of Eickemeyer should have been filed prior to May 12, 1873, but was not filed until May 27, 1873, owing to a misunderstanding between the applicant and his attorney. The applicant came to Washington on April 17, 1873, one hundred and fourteen days before the expiration of the patent, for the purpose of having the application for the extension prepared for filing. His attorney understood that he was first to examine the case and make a report of his opinion in relation thereto, and to await further direction before preparing and filing the application for an extension. The applicant, however, supposed that the application was to be promptly prepared and filed by his attorney, and had no idea, until a few days prior to the date on which he did file it, that such had not been done. The patent is now wholly owned by the applicant, and the extended term will inure solely to his benefit. During the time he was developing his invention he was supporting himself and family on wages of nine dollars a week. Before the issue of his patent he was obliged to convey one-half interest therein to parties who would defray one-half of the cost of obtaining the patent; and subsequently, in 1859, being in debt, he was compelled at different times to sell portions of his interest, leaving as his remaining interest one undivided sixth part of the patent. The parties having the controlling interest failed to render the invention remunerative to any considerable extent, and the aggregate sum received by the applicant, less expenses, was only $2,945.

Prior to this invention all linings of hats were sewed in by hand, and a good operator could sew linings into not exceeding three dozen hats per day, at a cost of twenty-five to twenty-seven cents per dozen. With this machine an operator of equal skill can stitch linings into from forty to fifty dozen hats per day, at a cost of from three to four cents per dozen, showing an actual saving of at least twenty cents per dozen. Upon these facts, the committee are of opinion that the prayer of the applicant should be granted, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BECK. I understand that this applicant is entitled to only one-sixth of this patent if he gets this extension; that he first disposed of one-half of it and then of the balance down to one-sixth, so that five-sixths of it belong to persons who did not invent any thing.

Mr. EAMES. There is no evidence of that kind before the committee.

Mr. BECK. Does not the report so state?

Mr. EAMES. It makes no statement of that kind. The bill itself authorizes the original inventor to make this application, and if the patent shall be extended it will inure to his benefit. I think the report says that it belongs solely to the inventor.

Mr. BECK. Does not the report itself say that he sold one-half of it to other persons, and then was compelled to sell other portions, so that now he has but one-sixth left?

Mr. EAMES. The report states that he was the sole inventor and is now the sole owner of the patent. If the patent shall be extended, it will inure to his benefit. I think he was obliged to sell all but one-sixth of the original patent in order to introduce the invention itself into use. But the extended patent will inure solely to the benefit of the inventor himself.

Mr. BECK. I had supposed of course that if the patent should be extended it would inure to the benefit of those who own the original patent. But I am told by gentlemen about me that it does not. I am inclined myself to vote against all renewals of patents that have run long enough, whether the invention is worth anything or not. If the inventor has made nothing, that shows that the invention is of no value.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] whether parties interested in the manufacture of hats by the use of this machine have had no notice of the hearing, or whether the application has simply been considered ex parte.

Mr. EAMES. I think there has been only an ex parte hearing; but I believe there is no opposition to the extension. Let me say further that this case comes within the rule which the committee and the House have generally followed in cases of this kind. This is a patent granted prior to the act of 1861 for fourteen years. Prior to the passage of that act the patentee had the right within a certain time to go before the Commissioner and ask an extension for seven years. It was only through a misapprehension on the part of the counsel of this patentee that his application was not made until some days after the patent had expired. He now comes here bringing himself within the rule which the committee has uniformly acted upon. He shows that he has made a useful invention; that he has not been properly remunerated; that he made reasonable efforts to have his patent renewed; and that it was through no fault of his that he lost his opportunity to go before the Commissioner and apply for a renewal. The committee unanimously recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not understand anything of the merits of the case, but some years ago I happened to be a member of the Committee on Patents for, I believe, all of one Congress and a portion of another. We had at that time, in 1860-'61, a good deal of legislation on the subject of patents; we revised the whole patent system. I then came to the deliberate conclusion, which has been confirmed by subsequent experience on the subject, that very few patents indeed ought to be renewed. During my service here as a member I do not recollect voting for the extension of more than half a dozen patents; and upon further reflection and observation I am inclined to think I made a mistake in voting for the renewal of some of those.

I want to announce that as a rule I am opposed to all these renewals. I think that all applications of this kind ought to be scrutinized closely, and nothing except the clearest evidence of a meritorious case—such as a unanimous report from the Committee on Patents—would induce me to vote for the renewal of any patent. I do not say this for the purpose of opposing the extension in this particular case, but to try, so far as I may have any influence, to put the House upon its guard with reference to this class of cases.

Mr. EAMES. The gentleman will allow me to say that this patent was granted in 1859 before the change of the law and when there was a right on the part of the patentee to make application for renewal.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand that there is an application pending before the Committee on Patents for the renewal of certain sewing-machine patents. That is a subject in which some of my constituents feel great interest. I would be pleased to hear from the gentleman from Rhode Island as to what action the committee has taken or is likely to take in regard to those patents.

Mr. EAMES. I do not know that I am at liberty to make such a disclosure. I will state, however, that as yet there has been no definite or final action by the committee on that subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. Are we likely to have any final action of the committee, either favorable or adverse, before the expiration of the present Congress?

Mr. EAMES. I think so.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] I believe the gentleman has admitted that he has voted for some six extensions during the last eight or ten years. Now, I think the Committee on Patents during this Congress have had before them perhaps two or three hundred applications of this kind; and we have reported favorably upon only eight or ten. So I think the gentleman from Indiana has been disposed to go further in the way of extending patents than the Committee on Patents.

Mr. NIBLACK. Well, sir, my experience on the subject extends over ten or twelve years; and certainly I have not gone very far in voting during that time for only six extensions. But I desire to get some information upon the question of these sewing-machine patents—a question in which every woman in the land has an interest.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. This case has nothing at all to do with that question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to know whether we are likely to have any report, either favorable or adverse, upon that subject during the present Congress.

Mr. EAMES. I think I am at liberty, as a member of the committee, to say to the gentleman from Indiana that there will probably be a final report of the committee on that question during this session. I do not feel at liberty to express here my own opinion as to that extension, for or against it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island whether the fact as stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that out of some two hundred or more applications for extensions only a small number have been acted on favorably, does not show that there is in the public mind a feeling that the patent system has been unduly extended, that the public is required to pay royalty for everything valuable to an extent far beyond any advantage that may accrue by way of encouraging inventors, and whether there ought not to be, in his opinion, some further limitation of the law of patents for the relief of the public.

Now, the gentleman knows in the matter of the history of inventions the greatest and most useful have been the result of the age, of the time; that different minds, working in different parts of the world upon the necessity which the general public felt, have come to the same conclusion independently of each other. In determining which has technical priority of invention, no one man should be entitled to such overshadowing benefits and advantages as have been derived by some inventors. Take, for instance, the sewing-machine needle and the planing machine and others of a like character. Does not the gentleman think there should be some further limitation in this matter of renewal of patents with a view to the relief of people generally?

Mr. EAMES. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Patents, and while they have this question under consideration it hardly comes here on a bill of this kind where the patentee simply seeks to come in under a provision of law existing in 1859 at the time his patent was granted. I think so far as the general question of the gentleman from Tennessee is concerned, without undertaking to speak for the community outside of the committee, that there has been a very careful examination and scrutiny of every case referred to the Committee on Patents before any report has been made to this House for its action. How the feeling may be outside the gentleman from Tennessee can judge as well as I can. I can only say here and now that this matter is before the committee on a general bill referred to them, and whenever their report is made it will be before the House for the fullest consideration as to the changes which ought to be made in the law in respect to what the gentleman has referred. I now demand the previous question on the pending bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 54.

Mr. EAMES demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EAMES and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 67.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was rejected.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was defeated; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. MONTGOMERY AND HEPBURN M'CLURE.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4336) for the relief of John A. Montgomery and Hepburn McClure with the recommendation that it do pass; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and requires the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of John A. Montgomery and Hepburn McClure, owners of a certain patent journal-box used by the Government of the United States on certain vessels of war and gun-boats during the late civil war without license, and to ascertain what compensation is due them; such judgment so rendered by said court shall be paid out of moneys appropriated or thereafter to be appropriated to pay the judgments rendered by said court.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I make the point of order against that bill that it contains an appropriation and must, under the rules, go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill and report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

E. W. BLACKINTON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4337) for the relief of E. W. Blackinton, postmaster at Blackinton, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE TO WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back the following cases, and moved their reference to the Committee on War Claims; which motion was agreed to:

A bill (H. R. No. 3559) for the relief of James A. Stewart, of Fulton County, Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3951) for the relief of William Lavery; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1503) granting relief to Agnes and Maria de Leon, heirs of Rebecca L. de Leon, for rent of house for United States troops.

CAPTAIN CHARLES S. REISINGER.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4062) for the relief of Captain Charles S. Reisinger, and moved its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM S. STEVENS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask to report back for reference to the Committee on War Claims a communication from the Secretary of War in the case of William S. Stevens.

The SPEAKER. The papers must be in possession of the Clerk before the change of reference can take place. Otherwise it would lead to irregularity.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understood such changes of reference were made upon the floor by simply giving notification of the fact, without having the papers presented.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the Chair has never permitted it to be done in a single instance, because it might lead to great irregularity.

WILLIAM L. NANCE.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4338) for the relief of William L. Nance, of Davidson County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN GRATZ.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted an adverse report in the case of Benjamin Gratz; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. I move the reference of that report to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES H. FRANK.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4339) for the relief of Charles H. Frank, with a substitute; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN KELLY.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, reported adversly on the bill (H. R. No. 2523) for the relief of John Kelly; and the same was laid on the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT PHILO SCHULTZE.

Mr. LAWRENCE also, from the same committee, reported back a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claim of Lieutenant Philo Schultze and others; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRUSTEES OF BETHEL COLLEGE.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 909) to reimburse the trustees of Bethel College, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. STEVENS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of William S. Stevens, for relief; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NEW MEXICO MILITIA CLAIMS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 1505) authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain and report the amount necessarily expended by the Territory of New Mexico in organizing, equipping and maintaining the militia force during the rebellion, and to ask that the substitute be put upon its passage.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I make the point of order that the bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is no occasion for this bill going to the Committee of the Whole. There is no appropriation in any part of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This is a public bill, and it requires unanimous consent to report it on Friday.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is for individual supplies, and I supposed it was a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only judges from the title. It is "a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain and report the amount necessarily expended by the Territory of New Mexico in organizing, equipping, and maintaining the militia forces during the rebellion." The Chair does not know what would constitute a public bill if that does not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill, if passed, would operate on individuals.

The SPEAKER. All bills operate on individuals.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw the report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a moment, to allow me to ask for the printing of a report?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am willing to yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must withdraw his motion absolutely or insist on it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then I withdraw the motion.

OVERCHARGE OF DUTIES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented a report to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 3828) to provide judicial remedies for overcharge of duties on tonnage and imports; and moved that the same be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

D. W. M'CLUNG.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4340) for the relief of D. W. McClung; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported the bill (H. R. No. 4341) for the relief of Andrew Jackson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALMONT BARNES.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 815) for the relief of Almont Barnes; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN AMMAHE.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3391) directing the Second Auditor to settle the pay and bounties account of John Ammahaie or Ammahe, and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LOWELL A. CHAMBERLIN.

Mr. COBURN also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlin; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

On agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 86, noes 35.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 88, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Danford, Davis, Dawes, Dobbins, Durham, Eames, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Gunter, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Thomas, Tremain, Walls, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—76.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to refer a bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] is pending, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. KELLOGG. Pending that motion I move that all debate upon the bill pending, being the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ships Wyoming and Ta-Kiang, be closed in one hour.

Mr. MYERS. Say one hour and a half.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Debate ought not to be limited on this bill. On Friday last those favoring the bill had the entire time at their control and disposal, and it seems not quite fair that the opponents of the bill should have no chance to be heard upon it.

Mr. MYERS. I had control of the time, and I yielded a large part of it to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think the time was about equally occupied by the friends and opponents of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] cannot be made under the rules. The Chair understood the gentleman to move that debate be limited to one hour and that the debate be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KELLOGG. O no, sir; my motion was simply to limit the debate to one hour.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the first man who gets the floor in Committee of the Whole is entitled to one hour. If the gentleman cuts off all general debate, then the five-minute debate runs on the bill until the committee agree to rise and report it to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope we shall limit debate on this bill to half an hour.

The SPEAKER. If that be done, then the five-minute debate will run until the committee directs that the bill be reported to the House.

Mr. MYERS. I object to any such limit to debate. I prefer that the debate be limited to one hour and a half and speeches confined to half an hour.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done. There are two classes of speeches known to the rules of the House in point of length, one is an hour speech and the other a five-minute speech. Anything else must be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. MYERS. Then I desire to make this suggestion which I think will meet the approval of the House that all general debate on the bill be limited to one hour and a half.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope that will not be done. This bill occupied the whole of our last session on private bills, and there are other bills of importance of a private nature.

Mr. MYERS. It had a right to do so, for this is a question of some importance.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let us have two hours for debate upon the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are several other bills of a private character pending in Congress which are also of importance.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say to the House that only forty-eight minutes were occupied last Friday on this bill. It did not take the whole day. My hour had not expired when the committee rose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move to amend the motion to close debate so as to limit the debate to one hour—general debate for half an hour and the balance of the time in five-minute speeches.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. We can limit the general debate to half an hour.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Cannot we limit the whole debate to one hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. You cannot limit the five-minute debate on a bill. The pending proposition is that all general debate close in one hour, and that question is not debatable.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I object to debate.

Mr. MYERS. With the permission of the House, I will say that if the debate is limited to one hour the opponents of the bill will occupy it, and they have already had most of the time that has been allowed for debate on the bill yielded to them. Let the time be one hour and a half. I offer that amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the time one hour and a half.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. KELLOGG, as amended, was then agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and being put, it was agreed to.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF WYOMING AND TA-KIANG.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ships Wyoming and the Ta-Kiang.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all general debate on this bill is limited to one hour and a half.

Mr. MYERS. I have twelve minutes of my hour remaining, but I do not intend to occupy them, and now yield the floor absolutely with the hope that I shall have the privilege of answering such arguments as may be advanced against this bill before the hour and a half closes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If the committee will give me their attention I do not propose to detain them at any great length, but only sufficiently to set forth the facts in the case. What I have to say about this bill will relate mainly to the Japanese fund, and only incidentally to whatever right these claimants may have upon the bounty of the Government.

This fund or a great portion of it has been in the hands of the Secretary of State since I have been in Congress at least, a period of six years. During that time the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, of which I have had the honor to be a member, has claimed, and I believe it has succeeded in persuading the House, that the measures looking to any use of this fund or any disposition of it should be considered in that committee.

During the second session of the Forty-second Congress the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a report to this House in respect to this fund. The report was made by Mr. Banks, who was at that time and had been for many years the chairman of that committee. I hold a copy of the report in my hand and will summarize it in the debate, and then I may ask to have it printed as a part of my remarks. It had been known for many years that there was difficulty in gaining access by the commercial nations of the world to some of the interior ports of Japan. After some of those ports had been opened by treaty and by general understanding to the commerce of foreign nations, the American frigate Wyoming and the merchant-ship Pembroke were fired upon in 1863 in one of the straits of the Japanese waters. The first attack was made upon the merchant-ship Pembroke while peaceably pursuing her commercial business. Afterward an American man-of-war was sent to punish the Japanese for this insult and injury to a peaceable commercial vessel, and that ship was also fired upon, and in the course of the engagement which ensued two of the Japanese or piratical vessels, whatever designation we may give them, were sunk, and a fire was opened pretty indiscriminately upon some shore batteries. That was in 1863.

Subsequently the French government, the English government, the Netherlands government, and the United States government, represented by their embassadors and ministers at Japan, agreed to assist the government of Japan in punishing the rebellious prince who had erected these fortifications, shut up these forts and closed these straits. An expedition was fitted out and sent for that purpose. So far as the United States is concerned that expedition consisted of a chartered steamer called the Ta-Kiang, with forty men and three guns on board. That was the whole American force that participated in that expedition. The French naval force consisted of three vessels of war, with sixty-four guns and eight hundred and fifty men. The English fleet numbered ten war vessels, with one hundred and sixty-four guns and twenty-eight hundred and fifty men, including marines and engineers. The Netherlands had four war vessels, with fifty-six guns and nine hundred and fifty men. That expedition completely demolished the shore batteries of this rebellious prince, and severely punished him and those who allied themselves to him. I think but one person was wounded on the American chartered steamer Ta-Kiang.

As the result of that attack the rebellious prince agreed to pay an indemnity to the powers that joined in the expedition of $3,000,000, one-quarter of it being given to each of them. The United States thus became entitled to $750,000. In the treaty or convention which was made October 22, 1864, it was stipulated that that sum was to include all claims of whatever nature for past acts of aggression, whether indemnity or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons. Mr. Pruyn, who was at that time our minister to Japan, in a communication to Mr. Seward dated November 28, 1863, in speaking of the negotiations which resulted in this convention, says:

I stated distinctly [to the Japanese governors] I made no demands for the insult to our flag in firing on the Pembroke nor on the Wyoming before any provocation was given, as I wished to leave that for the decision of the President; but that I would be prepared to receive any propositions which the government might be disposed to make.

In another place in the same communication he says:

I then reminded the governors of what I had said about the insult to our flag, stating that I did not wish to demand any money indemnity, though I wished the daimio punished; that if the government were disposed to offer a sum which would provide annuities for the families of the dead and for the wounded of the Wyoming, I would, for the purpose of giving further proof of friendship and moderation, take the responsibility of settling the entire case on such basis; but I made no specific demands, preferring, unless some offer was made, to await instructions.

In a communication from the same minister, in which he inclosed a copy of the convention, he says:

The British minister and myself, prior to meeting the Japanese commissioners, had agreed on $2,000,000 as the sum to be paid, and would have had no difficulty in its division among the powers interested. But some difference was suggested as likely to arise from the considerations whether the moral support afforded was not entitled to weight in such adjustment, and I did not feel that it was incumbent on me to interpose any objection to this view, as the moral support afforded by the United States was considerably in excess of the material support I was enabled to give. I therefore readily agreed to the reference of this delicate question to the home governments, with the understanding that a memorandum which I prepared should be signed and accompany the convention, so as to provide an equitable basis, if any should become desirable or necessary by reason of payment of the indemnity being demanded by them. I assented the more readily to the proposition of the envoy of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French to fix the amount at $3,000,000, because I thought it more likely to lead to the substitution of a port as a material compensation for the expenses of the expedition.

Bear in mind that our minister was ready to fix it at $2,000,000 at the start, but he assented readily to the proposition of the Emperor of the French to fix it at $3,000,000.

Should the Tycoon be averse to the opening of another port, and fail to make such offer in lieu of the payment of indemnities and expenses, the amount agreed on will not be regarded as unreasonable. But should he make the offer, it will be at the option of the four powers to accept it in full or in part payment, and in that event a moderate pecuniary fine may be imposed.

The treaty itself contains this stipulation, to which I desire to call the attention of the committee:

3. Inasmuch as the receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers, but the establishment of better relations with Japan, and the desire to place these on a more satisfactory and mutually advantageous footing is still the leading object in view, therefore, if His Majesty the Tycoon wishes to offer, in lieu of the payment of the sum claimed, and as a material compensation for loss and injury sustained, the opening of Simonoseki or some other eligible port in the inland sea, it shall be at the option of the said foreign governments to accept the same, or insist on the payment of the indemnity in money, under the condition above stipulated.

I read those paragraphs, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of showing that the American minister in the preliminary negotiations out of which this convention grew, and in the convention itself, expressly stated that a money indemnity was not what was sought.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention again to the fact that this expedition was comparatively an inexpensive one to our Government; in other words, that the indemnity could not in any view of it whatever have been looked upon as compensation for the expenses incurred by our Government in this expedition.

The aggregate claim for all injuries to American citizens and property in Japan was stated by the American minister in December, 1863, after this expedition, at $30,000. Demands were made for $32,000, exclusive of damage done to the Pembroke, which was fixed by the Japanese government at $10,000, and which I may say here was settled as an independent matter and not included in the treaty. So that the whole amount of damages claimed by the United States by way of expenses, or in any other way, as growing out of that expedition, could not have exceeded in any event $42,000. And yet by this treaty (if it is to be insisted upon and we are to hold this money) we have received $750,000.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, says in a communication to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in a letter of January 8, 1868, that "pursuant to the stipulations of the treaty with Japan of 22d October, 1864, in which the United States was a party, this Government has received from the Japanese government, without substantial equivalent, as its share of the indemnity stipulated to be paid by that government, the sum of $600,000 in gold." And since that period the balance of this indemnity has been paid.

Now, sir, as was stated in the debate one week ago, this matter has before been brought to the attention of this branch of Congress. The Committee on Foreign Affairs at the time this report was made submitted a proposition to remit the payment of the then unpaid installment of this indemnity. After a full discussion the House passed the bill, but it failed to receive the assent of the Senate, and did not of course become a law. It was not acted on in the Senate at all, as I understand.

Mr. TREMAIN. Did that bill provide for retaining anything?

Mr. MYERS. It provided for retaining one-half and releasing the other half.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I prefer to state the matter myself, and let the gentleman correct me afterward, if he deems it necessary. It provides for relinquishing to the Japanese government the unpaid installment, which I think was one-third of the whole sum.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If it does not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to put an inquiry to him. Minister Pruyn, in his communication, spoke about receiving a part of this fund, so as to guarantee an annuity to the survivors of the six persons who were killed on board the Pembroke. I want to know whether the gentleman's idea is to give up that part of the minister's claim which seemed to be based upon such an annuity, which is the substance of this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is not at all the substance of this bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. So far as it goes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. No, sir. In respect to that I will say that I am not proposing now an entire disposition of this fund. What I am endeavoring to show is that this fund was not given to us for any such purpose as that contemplated by this bill, whatever else may have been the purpose for which it was given. The paragraph to which the gentleman has called my attention, and which I have already read, is contained in a letter from Mr. Pruyn to Mr. Seward, in which he speaks of his interview with the Japanese governers in respect to it, and in which he said that "if the Government were disposed to offer a sum which would provide annuities for the families of the dead and for the wounded of the Wyoming," he "would, for the purpose of giving further proof of friendship and moderation, take the responsibility of settling the entire case on such basis."

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Will not the basis on which the Committee on Foreign Affairs have gone go so far as to give up the whole of this, so that there will be no annuity, on the basis of which that communication was made—no annuity for the survivors of those who lost their lives in that engagement?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. When that question is presented by any bill, whether reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs or otherwise presented to the House, it will be a proper time to discuss it. I am not questioning here whether a pension should be granted to the widows and orphans of those who were killed upon the Wyoming, or whether anything by way of annuity, which would be kindred to a pension, should be granted to them. I am simply saying that there is nothing in this treaty, nothing in the negotiations out of which it grew, nothing in the situation of the matter as it now stands which warrants us in using this money for such a purpose as is contemplated by this bill.

I am clearly (and I have no hesitation in making the declaration) in favor of paying the larger part of this fund—whether enough should be retained to make some provision, as suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut, or not I am not prepared to say—but I am clearly in favor of returning the larger part of this fund to the Japanese government. I had personal occasion to know, at the time the matter was under discussion in a former session of Congress, that the Japanese representatives here were very earnestly desirous that we should at least not exact the residue of that indemnity. It has been, I think, a recommendation made by every Executive since the treaty was entered into, certainly since the money has been in the custody of this Government, that we should certainly pay it to Japan or do something with it entirely acceptable to Japan. Mr. Seward himself stated in the letter to which I have called attention that we had received this money without substantial equivalent; and therefore, having received it without substantial equivalent, the conclusion would follow as a matter of course that we ought to return it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the case stands like this, so far as the great bulk of the money is concerned: Here were four strong powers (our Government I admit being but weakly represented) who had their hands upon the throat of this weak power, and they exacted from it as a ransom—the word does not sound pleasantly I know when we are speaking here—as a ransom, as though we held it in subjection, as though the lives and liberty of its people were wholly in our hands, and they could not escape from destruction unless they offered us ransom—that as ransom Japan should give $3,000,000. When we take that in the light of the correspondence which the American minister at that time had with our Government, we see that it was exacted only for the purpose of securing better commercial relations with Japan in the future, that he had not thought at that time this money was ever to be paid to our Government. At one time he was ready to consent to $2,000,000, but afterward went up to $3,000,000 on the suggestion of the French minister, because his object was to secure better commercial relations with Japan in the way of opening their ports, mentioning in particular the port of Simonoseki. I believe it has been the policy of this Government for the past six years to cultivate the most friendly relations with Japan in every particular.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me ask the gentleman a question at this point, as he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and of course has studied the question. It appears that England, France, and the Netherlands furnished five hundred or one thousand men and several vessels. Now, let me ask the gentleman whether he thinks the indemnity, so far as they were concerned, was more than it ought to be for furnishing that large body of men? Was it more than their actual expenses, considering the number of vessels and men furnished? Were not our own losses, although we had not as many vessels, quite as great as that of the other powers?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We had no loss at all.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I mean loss of men.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In this expedition not a man was lost.

Mr. MYERS. But the treaty covers both expeditions.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that; but in this expedition the Americans did not lose a single life.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I refer to loss of life on board of the Wyoming.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. When the Wyoming was sent out to resent this insult and to chastise the Japanese for having fired upon the United States ship Pembroke, I think four men were killed; but in this expedition out of which this indemnity grew the Americans had only a single chartered Japanese vessel with forty men and three guns. There were, I think, some two thousand men in the expedition on the part of other powers, with two or three hundred guns altogether. I suppose if we had a large force there in that expedition which caused us to spend a large amount of money perhaps we ought to have been indemnified for that expense. As Secretary Seward has said, however, we ought not to have this fund, because the expedition so far as we were concerned was attended with no heavy expense. He further stated that we received this money without any substantial equivalent, and it ought to be returned.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that this indemnity was not merely to cover the expenses of the expedition to which the gentleman from Vermont refers but also the loss of men on board the Wyoming. I should like to know as a matter of fact how that is.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The terms of the treaty include all claims of whatever nature for past aggressions on the part of the Mikado, which of course covers the loss on the Wyoming.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understand this bill does not provide for pensions in the case of the persons who were killed, but prize-money only.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Precisely; prize-money.

Mr. MYERS. Permit me to answer that question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would rather not. Now to return to the point on which I was speaking at the moment I was interrupted by the gentleman from Connecticut. I will say we have been endeavoring by treaty stipulations in various ways for the last six years to cultivate closer and more friendly relations with Japan. We have at the same time exacted a large money indemnity, a ransom which, as I have before stated but which cannot be too often repeated in the hearing of the House, has been declared by the chief officer of the State Department we received without any substantial equivalent. Now that certainly is dealing with a power with which we desire to cultivate friendly relations in a very hard and exacting spirit, and a spirit certainly with which I should suppose the American Congress would have no sympathy whatever.

Now, sir, as I do not like to detain the committee, and have already detained it longer than I expected, let me call the attention of the committee to the provisions of the bill. It takes out of this fund $125,000—

To be distributed among the officers and crew of the United States ship Wyoming, and officers and crew who manned the Ta-Kiang on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of September, 1864, the same to be distributed as sea-pay to the officers and crew attached to the Wyoming, according to the pay-roll of said ship on the 16th day of July, 1863; and to the officers and crew detached from the United States ship Jamestown, and who manned the Ta-Kiang, according to the pay-roll of said ship on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of September, 1864: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be held and taken to be in full satisfaction for all bounty, ransom, or prize-money, or claim therefor, on the part of the officers and crews aforesaid, under any and all existing laws of the United States or regulations of the Navy Department, for the destruction of piratical vessels at Simonoseki, on the 16th day of July, 1863, and bombarding the forts erected at the straits of Simonoseki, in September, 1864. And if any of the officers or crews aforesaid shall have received any bounty, ransom, or prize-money for the service aforesaid, the same shall be deducted from the amount to be paid such officer or seaman under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That no money shall be paid to any assignee of the mariner, but only to the mariner or his duly authorized attorney in fact, or, in case of his decease, to his legal representatives, excluding any assignee.

It is said in the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs that—

As these ships were not, strictly speaking, "enemy's ships," the bounty of $200 allowed by the act of July 17, 1862, for each person on board of "any ship or vessel of war belonging to an enemy," sunk or otherwise destroyed in an engagement, if of equal or superior force, cannot be claimed as an absolute right.

So that this bill is based upon the theory that these persons have not any right to any of this money as prize-money; that it cannot be given to them as a matter of absolute right; and, as I understand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] in opening the case, has presented it mainly as a gratuity; in other words, that we have received this large amount of money, that we have it on hand, that nobody is better entitled to it than these men, and therefore that we give it them. I cannot agree to any such logic as that. If these men have a right to this money, very well; then they ought to have it. If they have not a right to this money, it should no more be given to them than any other money. But I claim, Mr. Chairman, that they have no more right to this money than they have to any money that is in the Treasury of the United States. If they have any right to this money it must grow out of the treaty, and the treaty expressly says that this is for the expenses—"the expenses" entailed by the operations of the allied squadron, or for the ransom, if you please, of Simonoseki. I take it that does not give those persons who may have been engaged in that expedition any right to this money because it was given as a ransom for Simonoseki.

If any part of this should be given to anybody other than to the Japanese government, I agree it may be given with some propriety, with some justice, as an annuity to the widows and children of those who were killed on the Wyoming. Of course they are not entitled to a pension unless it should be given to them specially, because this was not a war; although it seemed from some of the remarks made here the other day that it was about the most extensive naval war we had had for many years; and I expected before long to see this chartered steamer Ta-Kiang, with its forty men and three guns——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. One gun.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Three guns.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Only one that could be used.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I say that I expected before long to see this Ta-Kiang painted by some fine artist, and either adorning one of our panels here or hung up over the approaches to our galleries as matching Perry's Victory on Lake Erie, or some other of the great historic naval achievements which have made our supports on the sea famous for all time. It seemed that gentlemen thought it was one of the most illustrious engagements in which American mariners ever participated.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I would like to ask the gentleman, while he is belittling this engagement——

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let the gentleman wait a moment. And I am not certain but it would be a legitimate purpose if we were to take $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000, and appropriate it for the purpose of making forever famous this splendid achievement of the American Navy.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me ask the gentleman if there was not as large a loss of life on the Wyoming, in proportion to the number of men engaged, as there was on any one vessel, with one exception, during the last war?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am speaking of the Ta-Kiang.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am speaking of the Wyoming.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We are speaking of different vessels.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask my friend a question. He has read the treaty. Now, does not the treaty, by its provisions, include the acts of aggression in June, 1863; that is, the battle with the Wyoming?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We have no misunderstanding about the treaty. It does provide for all of those aggressions, and whatever damage was suffered by the Wyoming in that engagement ought to be compensated for out of this fund; and if annuities ought to be paid to the relatives of the deceased soldiers and mariners who were killed in that engagement, they ought to be paid out of this fund. I agree to that. It does cover that aggression, but it does not erect this engagement into a war with an enemy's vessels, by which you can come in here with this fictitious claim for prize-money to be distributed among the crew. I think it very likely that there would be hesitation now if the question were entirely a new one whether prize-money should be given any more on the sea than on land; whether the soldier who risks his life in storming a battery is not as much entitled to receive prize-money for it as the mariner or sailor who risks his life in a conflict with ships upon the ocean. If it were a new question, I think possibly there might be as much reason for granting prize-money in the one case as in the other. Certainly no argument in favor of prize-money would apply to a case like this, because when you attempt to carry the question of prize-money beyond its proper realm, beyond its strict statute of limitation, then the question which I have indicated will at once arise.

Now, sir, to close in brief I have to repeat what I have said, that this fund is not in our hands for any purpose like this. It is in our hands, I believe in justice, for the purpose of returning it to the Japanese government if they will accept it; certainly it is in our hands for no other purpose except to pay the actual losses which the Government sustained or which individuals sustained by reason of these aggressions; and I hold that you cannot with any justice in dealing with this fund say that the men who engaged in this performance of their duties, either as sailors or officers of the United States Navy, are entitled to anything more out of this fund than indemnity for what they actually suffered. I trust you will not carry the doctrine of prize-money beyond its limitations for the purpose of taking from this fund a sum which ought to be returned to Japan, and a very large sum of money. I yield the residue of my time to my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, its chairman, [Mr. ORTH.]

The following is the report of the committee referred to by Mr. WILLARD:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom were referred several bills to provide for the appointment of a secretary of legation at the court of Japan; to appoint student interpreters at that court; to compensate the Japanese government for the United States legation buildings in Japan; concerning unpaid installments of the indemnity fund, with several communications from the Secretary of State upon the same subjects, have considered the same, and report them to the House for consideration, with a statement of the origin and character of the Japanese indemnity fund.

Commercial intercourse between Japan and Christian nations was commenced by Commodore Perry's expedition from the United States in 1852. A treaty of peace and amity between the United States and Japan was signed the 31st of March, 1854. This was the first treaty made between Japan and foreign powers. It opened the ports of Simoda, in the principality of Idzu, and Hakodadi, in the principality of Matsai, to American vessels, and secured to Americans the freedom of the country within the limits of seven Japanese miles from an island in the harbor of Simoda. It also authorized the appointment of consuls for the United States at Simoda. After an absolute prohibition of communication with foreign nations for two hundred years, diplomatic intercourse was established by the United States. The Portuguese and Dutch had enjoyed the privilege of sending one or two vessels a year to Japan from an early period, but with very limited trade and no intercourse with the people. The success of the United States led England and Russia to send expeditions to Japan, and in the year following the negotiation of the American treaty the same advantages were granted to England, Russia, and Holland. A convention negotiated by Commodore Perry June 17, 1857, opened the port of Nagasaki, in the principality of Hizen, and secured the right of citizens of the United States to reside permanently at Simoda and Hakodadi. In July, 1858, Mr. Townsend Harris negotiated a commercial treaty for the United States upon the basis of that negotiated between the United States and China in 1854. This treaty permitted the residence of diplomatic agents at Yedo, and the appointment of a minister of Japan, to reside at Washington, and consuls at all ports of the United States. The ports of Kanagawa, Nagasaki, Nee-egata, and Hiogo were opened in succession at different periods of time to American vessels. Americans were allowed to reside at Yedo and at Osaca for purposes of trade. Religious freedom was secured to Americans, and places of public worship were to be protected by the Japanese government.

Intercourse was thus established with the principal Christian nations after an isolation of more than two hundred years. Great opposition was made to the new policy of Japan by some of the native princes, who were sustained by their retainers among the lower orders of the people. The period immediately following the negotiation of the commercial treaty by Mr. Harris was one of violent disorders; the Tycoon was assassinated, one of the principal officers of the foreign legations was murdered, and several legation buildings were burned. The native princes held in their pay masses of the people, who endeavored to intimidate native merchants and destroy the trade with foreigners. Small traders and workingmen were organized against the supporters of the new policy and those engaged in foreign commerce, and some of the most prominent silk merchants were assassinated during the period.

The rebels against the liberal policy of the Japanese government seized the forts, and some of the principal naval posts, and made war upon all foreign vessels. The American frigate Wyoming and the merchant-ship Pembroke were fired upon in 1863. In 1864 Choshu, Prince of Nagato, who ruled the provinces of Suwo and Nagato, having absolute possession of the Japanese fortifications which commanded the straits of Simonoseki, and having with him the person of the Mikado, or spiritual ruler, refused to recognize the validity of the treaties concluded by the Tycoon with foreign powers, and closed by force this chief passage to the principal inland sea of the empire.

In this controversy the Tycoon desired at first to conciliate the anti-foreign party, and was disposed to yield to their demands; but he was relieved from that necessity by the support which the treaty powers gave to his government. At his request the forces of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands in Japanese waters jointly determined to open the straits by force. The campaign opened on the 4th of September, 1864, and lasted five days. The fleets destroyed the batteries commanding the straits, blew up the magazines, threw shot and shell into the sea, carried away seventy cannon, and obtained an unconditional surrender from Prince Choshu, who agreed to pay the expenses of the expedition.

The treaties were ratified by the Mikado, as they had been before by the Tycoon, thus uniting the two elements of power existing in the government of Japan, and the liberal foreign policy of the Tycoon was firmly established. The government of the Tycoon, preferring to assume the expenses of the expedition, which Choshu had agreed to pay, entered into the convention of October 22, 1864, stipulating to pay the four powers $3,000,000, "this sum to include all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnity, ransom for Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons." The whole sum was to be paid quarterly, in installments of half a million dollars each.

One million and a half of dollars have been paid under this convention, and one million and a half of dollars remain unpaid. The Japanese government asked to have the payment of the balance deferred until 1872, because of its utter inability to meet the demands made upon it pursuant to the convention; its obligations to the allied governments being, however, fully recognized.

The Secretary of State informed the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by letter dated , 1872, that the whole amount to be paid under the convention to the four powers was $3,000,000; and it was stipulated that it should be paid in installments of one-sixth of the whole amount. Three installments have been paid to the several powers, amounting to $1,500,000; three remain unpaid, the principal of which amounts to $1,500,000, the share of the United States therein being $375,000.

Of the amount already paid by the government of Japan, one-fourth part has been received by the United States; which, being placed to its credit with Baring Brothers, of London, yielded the sum of £88,881 10*s.* 10*d.* This, transferred to New York, produced in currency the sum of $586,125.06. These funds were invested in 10.40 bonds of the United States at par. The accruing interest has been invested in the same class of bonds. This sum now amounts to $705,000 in registered bonds. The Secretary of State, in a communication, (Senate Executive Document 58, Forty-first Congress, second session,) says that he is not aware of any claims against this fund.

In a letter dated January 8, 1868, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Secretary of State (Mr. Seward) made this statement: "That pursuant to the stipulations of the treaty with Japan of the 22d of October, 1864, to which the United States was a party, this Government has received from the Japanese government, without substantial equivalent, as its share of the indemnity stipulated to be paid by that treaty, the sum of $600,000 in gold. This amount has been invested in United States registered bonds, and awaits such disposition as Congress may direct."

The aggregate claims for all injuries to American citizens and property in Japan was stated by the American minister in December, 1863, at $30,000. Demands were made for $32,000, exclusive of the damage done to the Pembroke, which was fixed by the Japanese government at $10,000. (Pages 463 and 475, Diplomatic Correspondence 1864-'65, part 3.) So that the whole amount of damages claimed by the United States would not exceed $42,000 up to December, 1863.

The naval force of the United States on the coast of Japan in September, 1864, was the Jamestown, with two hundred and eighteen men and twenty-one guns, and a chartered steamer, Ta-Kiang, with forty men and three guns. The James, town was assigned to the defense of the port of Yokohama, and the Ta-Kiang formed part of the expedition to Simonoseki. The French naval force consisted of the Semiramis, Dupleix, and Tancred, with sixty-four guns and eight hundred and fifty men. The English fleet numbered ten war vessels, with one hundred and sixty-four guns and twenty-eight hundred and fifty men, including marines and engineers. The Netherlands had four war-vessels, with fifty-six guns and nine hundred and fifty men.

It appears from this history that the indemnity fund was intended to satisfy "all claims, of whatever nature, for past aggressions on the part of Nagato, whether indemnity, ransom of Simonoseki, or expenses entailed by the operations of the allied squadrons." The Government of the United States has already received a sum which, with the interest thereon, amounts to more than $700,000. All the claims for injuries sustained by this Government in consequence of the operations of Nagato do not amount to $40,000. The expenses incurred by the Government of the United States by the participation of the chartered steamer Ta-Kiang in the operations against Simonoseki in 1864 cost the Government only a few thousand dollars.

The claim is, therefore, as stated by the late Secretary of State, Hon. William H. Seward, substantially without equivalent. It is confidently believed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, after a very careful consideration of the circumstances of the case, that the United States may wisely remit the unpaid installments of this indemnity fund without injury to the Government or the people. It is believed that such a policy will result in the establishment of more intimate relations between this Government and the government of Japan, and ultimately prove of great benefit to the commerce of the two countries and accelerate the progress of civilization.

The committee unanimously report a bill releasing the government of Japan from the payment of the installments of the indemnity fund remaining unpaid, and recommend its passage.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How much time has the gentleman got to yield?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know.

Mr. ORTH. It is not my purpose to detain the House at any great length upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Vermont to yield the remainder of his time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Yes, sir; I yield the residue of my time to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to enter at any very great length into the merits of the question now before the committee. My colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs from Vermont has stated very fully the history of this entire transaction, and I will simply add a very few words in reference to the precise object of the bill now under consideration and the questions of law involved in it. We have received this money, and the questions how we have received it and what we should do with it are merely incidental. The bill before us provides that a certain amount of money shall be paid to the officers and crews of certain American vessels—not as prize-money, because as such they have no legal right to one dollar of this money or to one dollar of the money in the national Treasury. It comes up then by way, as my colleague on the committee has very appropriately said, of a gratuity; and if the officers and crew of the Wyoming are to have any pay whatever from this General Government for what was done in opening of the port of Simonoseki, they ought to be paid out of the general Treasury of the country. If this bill made that provision I doubt whether it would find one-half the advocates that it does now.

Now, in order to do this thing, it is provided in the bill that we shall lay our hands not upon the money in the national Treasury, but upon this Japanese fund. It is a very easy thing to be liberal with other people's money. It is a very easy thing to be charitable when it costs nothing, and hence in that view it is well enough that we should glance at the history of this case and at the manner in which this money was acquired. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a very large sum of money. It was placed in our State Department, not in the Treasury, and neither this Congress nor any of our predecessors have yet felt themselves authorized to cover it into the Treasury. Why? Because Secretary Seward told us that we have received it without returning any just equivalent. We have from the moment we received it up to this hour regarded it as a sacred trust. What to do with it we have not yet fully made up our minds. In dealing with the government of Japan in this matter we must recollect that we were associated with the governments of Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands. Indemnity came to all these governments at the same time and under the same circumstances. So far as I am informed, the other three governments have never taken any steps with regard to returning this money, but it must be known that the expenses of each one of those governments in this case were one hundred fold more than ours. Great Britain had one hundred and sixty-four guns and twenty-eight hundred and fifty men; France had sixty-four guns and eight hundred and fifty men; the Netherlands had fifty-six guns and nine hundred and fifty men, while we had only forty men and three guns.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask my colleague on the committee a question. France had sixty-four guns and eight hundred and fifty men; England had one hundred and sixty-four guns and twenty-eight hundred and fifty men. Does the gentleman think that France should have been paid this indemnity in proportion to the number of men and guns that she employed?

Mr. ORTH. We got an equal share of the money without any distinction as to the number of men and guns employed.

Mr. MYERS. Because the power of the Government was there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Because our one gun——

Mr. ORTH. There were three guns.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Only one, if you please. It was because our one gun, as the British admiral certified, did as much service as any one fleet.

Mr. ORTH. No doubt about that. But that is not the question here or there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, it is.

Mr. ORTH. This money came to us. Thus far we may have hesitated in returning it to Japan out of a feeling of delicacy toward the governments connected with us in its acquisition. That the amount exacted from the Japanese government was unconscionable and enormous must strike every just man. Three million dollars for what? Because one of the governors of a portion of Japan, too strong for the power of the Tycoon, had set himself up to disregard the treaties made with our Government and with other governments. We were called upon by the Tycoon to assist in punishing his daimio, and we did so. When the question of money came up the Japanese government said "We will give you $3,000,000." We took it; but under what circumstances? Three of the most powerful nations of this earth were there with their hundreds of guns and hundreds and thousands of men, threatening the weak and semi-civilized nation of Japan, until they had extorted from it a sum of money, the very idea of keeping which puts the blush of shame on the cheek of every man. Now, is this Republic of ours to become a buccaneer, to roam over the world to avenge supposed insults to the American flag and have them wiped out by dollars and cents? Thus far, thank God, in our history no such page has been written.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How with the Barbary powers?

Mr. ORTH. There was war then. But that question is not now before Congress. We have thus far steadily kept this money from going into the public Treasury to be paid out as other moneys are. We have kept it invested and set apart, because for the last twelve years the feeling with every administration, with every Secretary of State, has been that this fund is surrounded by circumstances which make it a little more sacred than ordinary dollars and cents. The question as to what to do with this money will come up in the future.

The question directly before us to-day is whether we shall use this money thus acquired and held by us and hand it over to persons who have no legal claim upon it. That is the whole question to be settled by the passage of this bill, whether we shall take the money thus acquired and thus held and pay it over to officers and a crew who have no legal claim upon it, and thus put the entering-wedge into the disposition of this fund. Sir, I hope and trust this Government will never permit that to be done.

I promised that I would say but a word or two in this matter, simply in furtherance of the views so clearly set forth by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] I hope and trust that the good sense of this House will see that this bill does not pass.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Before I go on I desire to yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] who reported this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to forty-five minutes, of which he yields fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. I do not know that even fifteen minutes are needed to reply to the attack on this bill made by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] There is but one question before the committee. We now have a fund of nearly $1,000,000 secured to us by a solemn treaty, known as the Japanese indemnity fund. This result is due to the sailors who secured it by two hard-fought battles, one in June, 1863, and one in September, 1864, when they were aided by foreign powers. These sailors not only won this fund, but reopened the ports of Japan to us, secured untold benefits to our commerce, and prevented a bloody war. Now, do they deserve to have the equivalent of prize or bounty-money, which if open war had been declared would have been theirs under the law? The Committee on Naval Affairs unanimously say that they do. The House at the last session so said and so voted. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] tries to persuade us that this question was always held by the Committee on Foreign Affairs as a matter peculiarly pertinent to their jurisdiction. I am a member of that committee, but claim no such peculiar province for them. In the Senate four reports have been made in favor of the bill.

That question being determined, out of what fund should this bounty-money for these sailors come? The argument opposed to us looks to prevent their obtaining it from this fund; and then if they attempt to get it out of the Treasury, they can more readily be beaten, as we all know it would be much more difficult to obtain it in that manner. If their claim be just, as I have already contended, then the money most appropriately should be paid from the very fund which is the result of their exploits and gallantry, the bloodshed and the lives lost, without which it would not be ours to give.

We were virtually at war with Japan. The Mikado, siding with the rebel prince who fired on our vessels in violation of treaty obligations, declared the ports closed against foreigners, and the Tycoon, yielding his authority, joined in the edict, although faintly protesting that he was powerless without the aid of the treaty powers. Our flag was insulted and assaulted from powerful vessels bearing the Japanese flag as well as from forts and batteries on their shore. In volume 2, Executive Documents, page 1106, will be found the Mikado's order to expel the foreigners and sweep them away as with a broom, and the Tycoon's order submitting to it. On page 1124 of the same volume the British chargé d'affaires says this edict "is unparalleled in the history of all nations, civilized or uncivilized;" that it is in fact a declaration of war by Japan itself against the whole of the treaty powers and the United States. Minister Pruyn (page 1121) wrote to the Japanese authorities that "even to propose such a measure is an insult to my country and equivalent to a declaration of war."

The treaty itself provides for the "indemnities of war" and recites that the Tycoon was powerless.

No war, indeed, gentlemen say! yet six Americans were killed in a bloody battle fostered by the ruler of Japan and six or seven severely wounded; and forsooth we are not even to retain the indemnities of war paid us, nor the expenses of the expedition stipulated for in the treaty, one of which in honor and equity would be the payment, if need be, out of our Treasury of just such bounty or prize-money as we were giving to men who sunk or captured vessels in our own war of the rebellion.

The treaty recites that this indemnity was to cover the acts of aggression and hostility in June, 1863, the time of the Wyoming fight.

So imminent was a war with Japan, that the Wyoming, the only vessel we could spare at that time, was sent out there, and while our other sailors, those who were engaged against the rebellion, were obtaining bounty and prize-money, frequently under technicalities of law, when they did not even partake in the contest, these brave men, with those of the Ta-Kiang in the subsequent and no less important battles of September, 1864, have as much right to our most grateful consideration.

Gentlemen say we ought to repay this money to Japan. I happen to remember as much about the history of this case as my colleagues upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs. My distinguished colleague, now chairman of the committee, [Mr. ORTH,] was out of Congress at that time; he ought to have been here. Mr. Mori, the Japanese minister, not denying that the rebellious prince had paid a large part of this money, earnestly represented that it would promote good feeling for us to remit the unpaid balance of our half. It is in the stipulation made by Mr. Pruyn that his dominions should be imperialized. Some of them were confiscated. Mr. Fisher, United States consul at Kanagawa, informed me that the money so far as obtained for the first half was chiefly obtained from Nagato, and yet we are now proposing to give this very money, with interest, back to Japan. I am in favor now, as I was then, of remitting the half. What more in reason can be asked? But I do not propose to give back more than Japan asks. This would be an insult rather than an act of friendship.

Mr. ORTH. The remarks just made by my colleague on the committee [Mr. MYERS] may cause an impression that the Japanese government has asked the return of this money. Certainly that government has never made such a request.

Mr. MYERS. I will distinguish the minister from the government in what I am saying. Mr. Pruyn writes to me that—

> The first agreement was made between the Daimio Nagato and the naval officers, and was subsequently assumed by the government of Japan. * * * The Japanese government was of course unwilling to recognize a treaty made with him, as if he were an independent prince. Our war and expeditions against him were justified on the ground that he was a rebel whom the government could not subdue.

By turning to part 3, Diplomatic Correspondence, 1863-'64, page 553, it will be seen the sum was to be paid by the Tycoon "in behalf of Choshu;" and the treaty speaks of the "ransom of Simonoseki," his town—of course paid by him. I am friendly to Japan, and have already spoken highly of their great advance in civilization, largely the result of keeping open their ports; but if we shall ever give back this fund, at least keep all that is due for the wrongs done, all that may compensate for the lives lost, and the achievements of the men of those American vessels.

It is said here, however, that this is a trust fund. Sir, if there was ever a mode in which we have done especial wrong to our citizens, it has been under our treaties. We bartered away their claims for French spoliations. For over seventy years they have knocked at the doors of Congress unsuccessfully; and just as the Senate and House were about to do what was right by them, the Alabama treaty came in, and some one stopped the French spoliation bill, sending it to the Judiciary Committee to inquire whether, if we paid the insurance companies under that bill, we might not commit ourselves and be obliged to pay their claims which footed up dollar for dollar with interest we had presented to and received from Great Britain. Why not give this money back to England? We have not paid it according to the trust. Then there is the Chinese indemnity fund. We recovered $-00,000 for the aggressions upon our citizens; $400,000 of this is left for whom? Under the leadership of the gentleman from Vermont we have refused year after year almost the only claim of American citizens that remains upon that fund. Why not offer that back, too? O, yes! It is a "trust fund!" Our duty and our trust here are for the American people. Our duty is not to decry the gallant services of sailors like these, who won brilliant battles. I do not care whether it was with one ship and one gun or with a dozen. To the moral force and power of our Government, which first opened the ports of Japan, we added in the last battles but a few guns, but they were telling ones, and won the thanks and admiration of England and the other treaty powers. Hear what one of these sailors who participated in the Wyoming fight wrote a day or two ago to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER:]

> We received and returned their fire at pistol-shot range, sustaining the loss of six killed and five wounded, our ship being badly cut up. We fought against great odds, the Wyoming mounting but six guns, while the enemy mounted at least thirty-five. Therefore why should we not receive some notice from our country for this affair? Have not the widows and orphans of these brave men who freely gave up their lives for the country's honor a greater claim upon the indemnity fund than Japan?

How does Japan look at a matter of this kind? But the other day she recovered, not from an enemy, not from rebels, but because of the assaults of Chinese savages in Formosa, $700,000, paid by the Chinese government. One hundred and forty thousand dollars as "consolation money!" I ask gentlemen who oppose this bill what "consolation money" is there here for the widows and orphans of the men killed upon the Wyoming?

England looks more rigidly to the punishment of wrongs upon her citizens. She made Japan pay $100,000 for the murder of Mr. Richardson, a member of her legation, which occurred about the time of the Simonoseki outrages.

Several learned gentleman have read to us very carefully from parts of our treaty that in it the foreign powers say the receipt of money from Japan was not their object. That is true, and they therefore gave Japan the option to open a port at Simonoseki or some other eligible port in the inland sea. Not only did the Tycoon fail to make such an offer, but the ports of Hiago and Osaka, stipulated by the Harris treaty to be opened in January, 1863, were kept closed for five or six years after that time. Let us be just to Japan, but be careful lest we do injustice to our own people, and especially to the defenders of our flag.

I cannot close better than by reading the views expressed to me in a letter by our late minister, Robert H. Pruyn, who, if diplomacy won for us this fund, is certainly entitled to the credit of it. Listen to what Mr. Pruyn says:

> I think the United States have done right in releasing the government of Japan from the obligation to pay the balance. * * * * * * *
> But whatever may be done, provision should be made for our brave seamen whose exposure and blood secured it. They were banished to that distant sea while their associates were securing prize-money at home, and justice and common honesty require this recognition of their services.

The bill is a just one. It comes from a committee which has given it full and fair examination, and has its unanimous sanction. It was passed by the House in the last Congress, reported favorably by the Senate, but not reached in time for passage. Shall we not stand by that record? Let us do justice to those brave men, and the country will applaud the act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would I could get for a few minutes the attention of the House to a matter which, while of small importance when considered by itself, has, from the extraordinary course taken by some portion of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, become a matter of very great importance.

Let me first state the circumstances out of which this money came to us and the grounds of our claim. I admit there is no legal right to this money. If there was, they should not be here to-day asking a law to be passed.

It is talked of as if this was never done before. That is an argument to the prejudice. I have in my hand, which was used on a former occasion, a list of precedents. When the Guerriere was captured by the Constitution Congress allowed $50,000; and for the capture of the Java $50,000. For the capture of the Peacock by the Hornet Congress allowed $25,000. All these were gratuities. For the capture of the brig Detroit the captors were allowed $12,000. In the capture of the Reindeer and Avon by the Wasp, the amount allowed was $50,000 and twelve months' wages. For Le Duc Montebello, Le Petit Chance, and L'Intrepide, captured by Captain Porter, Congress allowed the whole value of the captured vessels. By act of Congress, in the case of the British vessels captured on Lake Erie, Congress allowed $255,000, the value of the vessels, to be distributed as prize-money. In addition, $5,000 was given to Perry, besides his share of the prize-money. Congress also allowed for British vessels captured on Lake Champlain $400,000—the value of the vessels. That was in our infancy, when our expenses outside of war were not more than $2,500,000 a year. In the case of the capture of the Levant by the Constitution the amount allowed was $25,000. For the Algerine vessels captured by Decatur the amount allowed by Congress was $100,000. Here is where your cestui qui trust for semi-barbarians comes in. The pirates of Algiers were not treated by our forefathers as though they had any such sacred trust. When they captured our seamen we sent out and captured their vessels, battered down their ports, and paid our seamen for doing it.

Now I have shown what the precedents are. The next point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is what happened here. The Japanese undertook in their savage fury to have their junks run down and burn American vessels. They undertook to control the entrance to the ports of their country through the straits of Simonoseki. We sent a war vessel there to open those ports. This was in the midst of our war, when we had not any war vessels to spare. Under these circumstances the Wyoming went there and engaged these batteries, single-handed and alone, fought and destroyed them, and sunk the Japanese junks, and these peculiar friends of the Committee on Foreign Affairs went down, as they ought, under the water in very great numbers. What happened next? The Wyoming had more men killed and wounded in that expedition in proportion to the crew than the average upon Lake Champlain, Lake Erie, or in any battle which made us famous as a naval nation. Next year all the leading maritime nations of the world made a joint expedition, the French vessels carrying sixty-four guns, the British two hundred and thirty, and the Dutch sixty, I believe. The officers of the allies sent up there to make an attack came to the captain of the American vessel and said, "Won't you take part with us?" He said, "I cannot without the order of our minister;" and our minister there at Japan said, "You take part." Then came another trouble, and that trouble was that the Jamestown, a sailing vessel, drew so much water that she could not get within sight of the batteries of the enemy. The captain said to Lieutenant Pearson, "I am ordered to take a part. Will you not take this little chartered steamer, the Ta-Kiang, armed with a twelve-pound howitzer, which would shoot about half a mile? Won't you go up there and act as tender to the British fleet?" "No," said Pearson, "I will do no such thing; but if you will give me eighteen men from the Jamestown and its thirty-pound gun and Sharp's rifles for each man, I will go there and take a share in the engagement." "Well," says Captain Price, "I am not authorized to do that. But if you choose to do so you may, taking your own risks." Thereupon they took the one gun of the Jamestown, a thirty-pounder, on board the Ta Kiang, a little cockle-shell of a steamer, drawing four feet of water, and Pearson went up on her, and when the action came on he lay by means of his light draught right under the forts, and every shot told. And he did such excellent service that—what happened? Why they sent here the Representative from Vermont to laugh at him and belittle him. That is how he is repaid. They sent a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to sneer at him and talk about the little war and the little bravery and the little courage and the little action. It takes little to appreciate little in this world.

But how did the British government appreciate it? I have it here stated in the volume of diplomatic correspondence. The action was so brave, so gallant, the action of our Navy was so illustrious, I have a right to say the British commander came on board that little cockle-shell after the three days' fight was over and personally thanked Lieutenant Pearson for his gallant services. More than that. He sent home and asked the Queen, in consideration of those gallant services, to do what never was done to an American before or a citizen of any other nation fighting beside the British forces. The Queen ordered to be sent to him the decoration of the military division of Knight Companions of the Order of the Bath. But our Constitution forbids our officers to take any foreign order, and the decoration could not be accepted. I will read the dispatch of the British minister on that occasion.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1864.

SIR: I had the honor of addressing you a note on the 17th instant under the instruction which I had received from Her Majesty's government, requesting the United States Government to convey to Lieutenant Pearson the acknowledgment of the lords commissioners of the admiralty for the ready co-operation which that gallant officer afforded to Vice-Admiral Sir A. L. Kuper during the operations in which the combined forces of Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States had recently been engaged in the straits of Simonoseki, in Japan.

It is now my pleasing duty to state to you that the Queen is desirous of evincing her high appreciation of the zealous co-operation of Lieutenant Pearson, and of the conduct of the United States naval forces on the occasion in question, by nominating Lieutenant Pearson a companion of the military division of the Order of the Bath; and her Majesty trusts that the President of the United States will be pleased to allow that officer to accept the honor which Her Majesty is desirous to confer upon him.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

J. HUME BURNLEY.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c.

Now, sir, such is the way Great Britain looks upon these services, and such is the way Vermont looks upon them—I beg pardon, I should have said part of Vermont.

Then, sir, what further was done? Although we had but one effective gun there, yet our Navy had done such good service that when the allied powers came to make their treaty they allowed us a full share of one-quarter as a punishment upon these savages for burning American vessels, for shutting out American commerce, and for firing on the American flag. They gave us one-quarter, although we had but one gun there doing duty. And having given us that one-quarter, what happened? It was paid to the State Department; and there has not been power enough in Congress to get it out of the hands of the State Department and into the Treasury, because Mr. Seward said "Don't do it now," and he was received with the highest consideration in Japan because of having kept it out of the Treasury of the United States.

Now I want this to be put into the Treasury of the United States. It is the people's money, earned by the blood of our sailors and earned by the destruction of our ships—earned from the savages that the Committee on Foreign Affairs think we had some trusteeship for. I never undertook the trusteeship of any savage nation, thank God. We have enough savages in our own borders without going outside.

Now that is the condition of things. Nobody denies it. This fund of $700,000, now by interest grown up to $850,000, was paid to us as indemnity for men's lives, for the orphanhood of children, the widowhood of women, the destruction of commerce, and the outrage on our flag; and they tell us we ought to blush for having taken it.

Ay, men that have so little appreciation of valor as to think that our sailors ought to blush when they take money won by their own valor! Money should only be got by carrying on business in a small way in a grocery. That is the only money fit to take.

I insist, sir, that the life of an American seaman, the widowhood of an American woman, the orphanage of an American child, made so by savages, should be paid for by those savages to any amount of money as punishment that we choose to inflict upon them. But, sir, we are told when we go to inflict this punishment with the other civilized nations of the world that these are savages, and we must not defend our sailors and our commerce against them; and when our brave sailors do a good deed, there is some man found to belittle them and bring them down to his own level.

Mr. MYERS. The British government demanded $100,000 for the murder by the Japanese of Mr. Richardson, of their embassy, and they obtained it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, sir, this is a fund got by these men, obtained by their blood and valor, and we come here and ask simply that there may be a small portion of it divided among their orphaned children and widowed wives, and those of them who still live. There is their commander, a man from Pennsylvania, as good a man as ever trod the deck of a ship, a man who distinguished himself everywhere during the war. He has been offered the best decoration known to British heraldry—that of a Knight Companion of the Bath, and whatever the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] may think, he would give more than this whole sum to be enabled to accept that decoration; but the Constitution of the United States forbids his taking it, and unless we give him the right he cannot take it, although the Queen of Great Britain tenders it to him all the time. He comes here now and says "I do not want anything for myself more than the share which the law gives me in this prize-money, but I do ask for the poor men who were my crew something to compensate for the wounds they have received, and something for the widows and children of those who perished in the service of the Government."

And, sir, we are told that this was not a war. I can say to some of my friends that it was a long enough war for them and quite as large as they would have liked to take a part in. It was an action against a barbarous people, and was made in co-operation with other civilized nations. Now, if we choose to take the rest of this fund to educate the Japanese up to the point of civilization, perhaps they will at some time get up to the condition that the Committee on Foreign Affairs now think they occupy in the world. I will not say what I think of that; but what I desire to be done is that this money shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and if you have anything to spare, give it to the men who were injured in this war, make good something of the losses of their blood, or use it to pay for some church burned during the war, some college that was wrecked during the war, some hospital, charitable or otherwise, that was destroyed during the war. If you propose to do that, my word for it you will find the same opposition brought against such a gratuity by the same gentlemen who are opposing this bill, and you will find them voting against it. Does not everybody know that some class of men will be found voting against such a measure?

I say again that here is a fund won by our sailors and given to us by their valor. It is our own property. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs had done its duty this money would have gone into the Treasury of the United States, and we come here and ask from that fund a small amount, $125,000 out of $800,000, for the men by whose blood and valor it was obtained. We are told that this is a sacred trust. Well, where is the bill by which the Committee on Foreign Affairs propose to execute this trust? Why are we here in the expiring days of this Congress without seeing any such bill? If the committee believe that it was their duty to bring in a bill to return this fund, why have they not done it? Why have not the Committee on Foreign Affairs provided either for covering this money into the Treasury or for refunding it to the Japanese government? Why do they keep it as a sweet morsel to be rolled under the tongue of the State Department for their purposes?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman is aware that this sum is invested in Government bonds and is not used by the State Department at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes! I understand that. It is invested in Government bonds, and I want to save the interest upon $125,000 of this amount on which we pay interest day by day. Does the gentleman quite know where these bonds are? I do not. They may be loaned to be the bottom of the circulation of some national bank, for aught I know. I have known bonds to be loaned in that way. I only say this: There it is accumulating and the people are paying interest on this money, and with the threat that after we have paid interest on it long enough the whole money shall be turned over to these barbarians to enable them to build more forts to burn our merchant vessels. I will not do it. I want to stop at least $125,000 of it, if no more, and then trust to the good sense of some future Congress to put the rest into the Treasury. For our part we agreed to an amendment to this bill by which the rest of the money was to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. But the astute gentlemen of the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a point of order upon that portion of the bill, so that the money could not be paid into the Treasury. They will not do anything with it. They are like the dog in the manger; they will not eat, themselves, nor allow anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN rapped to order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was not my allusion to that dog, was it? I did not mean by any manner of means to apply the fable too far.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen standing in the aisles will resume their seats, so that there may be order in the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This matter has been twice submitted to Congress; each time it has received the support of the House. We have heard all these arguments before and the House has unanimously insisted upon sustaining our gallant sailors. It has gone to the Senate, and has been four times reported upon favorably there, but it has never been reached so as to have a vote upon it. I want to send it over there once more, in the hope that this time the Senate will act upon it. But whether they will or not, let us do our duty; let us take the same stand in regard to these sailors that our fathers did about the heroes of Lake Erie. Let us sustain them against Japan as our fathers sustained Decatur against Algiers and the Barbary powers generally. Let our seamen know that when they are ordered into action by any one who has the authority to order them into action their country at home is looking on, and if they will do their duty well, if they will carry the flag with its former glory and honor, they will find a grateful country which will take care of them, and of their children when they are orphans, and their wives when widows.

Let us teach that lesson to every Jack Tar that stands on the forecastle; let us say it to every naval officer that stands on the quarter-deck, so that when he is in distant unknown seas, in barbarous lands where his portion may be death, he is still to carry that flag as these men carried it, until our rivals for naval supremacy on the seas shall have extorted from them the great tribute which the Queen of Great Britain is willing to pay to this young commander, not then thirty years old, and who is here, it may be to fail, if fail he must, in the House of Representatives of his own countrymen, and under the Dome of the Capitol and the statue of Liberty, and that, too, on a plea in favor of the very savages against whom his guns were directed and whom he overthrew.

Why do they not tell the whole truth about this matter? We took this money from the Japanese government and the Japanese government levied a contribution on these pirates in order to make them pay their share of it; and nearly or quite one-half of the amount, over $1,200,000 of the amount, which they had to pay the civilized world, they levied on these daimios and the pirates their followers, who were overthrown in the straits of Simonoseki after three days' fight. It was not a holiday fight; but the little Ta-Kiang lay there with the glorious Stars and Stripes floating at her peak, and the gun that did good service threw shot after shot while the missiles of the enemy flew around her and the flag still floated and the glory of the American naval power on the earth was sustained.

We shall not have any more large naval fights; there will be no more large navies brought together in war. Hereafter, on account of steam, fights must be single-handed, ship to ship, or else ships against forts. Therefore, whenever we have the picture of any fight painted, I agree that it would be well, as suggested, to take ten or fifteen thousand dollars of this fund and appropriate it to pay for painting a cartoon of this glorious little fight. And in one corner of that cartoon I would have the Queen of Great Britain offering the Order of the Knight Commander of the Bath to Lieutenant Pearson. And on the other side of the picture I would have a portrait of a member of this House sneering at him for his bravery.

Mr. ORTH. Which one?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There will be no difficulty in picking out the right one. And would you add in another part of the picture the House of Representatives of the United States refusing to honor the bravery and courage of its officers and men, while the Queen of Great Britain is willing to honor even her great naval rival? Is that the voice you are going to send out to your sailors, that even if they win the honors of their great naval rival, Great Britain, and get orders and commendations from her, (under your Constitution they cannot receive them,) the House of Representatives will not give them any tribute, but only belittling speeches and belittling votes? I pray you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, pause. I said when I began that this thing had got over and beyond the mere money sum of $125,000. It has come to be a question whether the House of Representatives will sustain the United States Navy against barbarians in foreign seas; whether you will recognize the services of your Navy; whether you will inspirit your naval officers and men, or whether you will prefer to them semi-barbarians, and a little more than semi, at that. It is for this reason I ask you to pause. It is for this reason I ask the attention of the House—not for myself, not alone for the cause of these men, though that is reason enough, but for the cause of the American Navy and the glory of the American flag upon the high seas, that its career in the future may be as honorable and may make our Navy as much respected as when in the times of Decatur and the war of 1812 it won itself a name among the nations of the earth.

Mr. MYERS. I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause down to and including the words "thereof to" in the ninth line, and inserting instead the words "the sum of $125,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will consent to that if the House will put it in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments coming from the committee are held to be first in order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not understand the committee to propose any amendments.

Mr. MYERS. There are some formal amendments, but I supposed they were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, they will be considered as agreed to. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have attempted by this amendment to separate two matters which are in this bill, and have been in the debate which has taken place upon it, strangely jumbled together, and which I think have no legitimate connection: First, the disposition of the Japanese indemnity fund now in our hands; second, the question of appropriate rewards or gratuities to the gallant sailors of the Republic. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has waxed exceedingly eloquent upon the merits of the Navy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] who preceded him was eloquent in the same direction. I have no disposition to take issue with these gentlemen or either of them. If it were in my power to express myself as loftily and with such magnificent eloquence as they discoursed on this subject, I certainly would not fail to do so. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that between the merits of the United States Navy and the rewards due to our gallant sailors, and the question of the proper disposition of a fund which we hold under a treaty with Japan, there is no proper connection. I have therefore sought by my amendment to separate the two things, so as to bring the committee, and afterward the House, to a direct vote upon the naked question of reward or gratuity to our sailors.

My amendment is to strike out the first eight lines of the bill which provide for the disposition of a part of this Japanese fund, and to substitute the ordinary words of an appropriation out of the Treasury, the effect of which will be to make the bill a bill to reward properly the sailors engaged in these fights, and to separate that from the other question which lies back of it—the question of the good faith and honor of the nation in regard to this fund received through diplomacy.

Now, sir, if we are to do an act either of justice or of generosity to our sailors, let us in Heaven's name do it like men, out of our own money, about which there is no question—money which is in the Treasury for that purpose, and over which we have control beyond the shadow of a doubt; but let us not take it from a fund as to which there is grave question whether we can do anything with it except to return it to the power from which we received it.

Time does not permit me to go into the discussion of the questions involved under the Japanese treaty and the action of our Government following it, as to what should be the disposition of this fund now in the hands of the State Department. But I believe (and in this I am in accord with the sentiment of I think every head of the State Department, and so far as I know every administrative officer who has had connection with the question from the time the money was paid into our hands to this time) that this money is in our hands without sufficient or proper consideration. I believe that there is but one course for an honorable, high-minded, noble nation to take in regard to it, and that is, at the proper time to return it, or at least the greater part of it, to the government from which it was received.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] makes a very proper distinction in this case. Here is a fund as to which our duties are somewhat doubtful, to say the least. To state the matter in the mildest manner, it is not certain what we ought to do with this fund. Here is a claim upon the Treasury in behalf of certain sailors, which is not quite a certain claim. It has not been established to my satisfaction that it is precisely analogous to previous claims which we have paid, though I am not very particular about that. But it is quite evident that if this were a claim standing upon its own merits, as the gentleman from New York desires it to stand, there would be a different class of arguments used in favor of it.

Now the logic of the gentlemen who support the bill in question is, "Here is a fund in regard to which the trust is somewhat doubtful, here is a claim the justice of which is somewhat doubtful, but we will make it all right by taking the doubtful claim out of the doubtful fund." It will very much help the elucidation of the question if the matter can be divided as gentlemen propose.

I desire to add but a word, and that is to put upon the record my protest against any disposition of this money except to return it to Japan. I am not so stubborn as to the manner of paying these sailors if there is anything like a reasonable excuse in the history of our Navy for doing it. I am willing to join in all the music and poetry and bell-ringing and cannon-firing that any man can devise in honor of the history of the Navy. It has chapters which thrill the pulse of every man. We are proud of it and wish the country to be proud of it, but when gentlemen sing its glories in this manner, winding up by saying "Give us so much money," they remind me of the wandering minstrels who sing the beautiful airs of Italy and then pass round the hat at the end of the music. "Glory to the Navy; give us $100,000." That is the song.

Now, sir, they tell us we must teach our Navy to do their duty by paying them. We are in danger of teaching the world quite a different lesson. We run the risk of saying to the world the rule of the United States is "Get what you may and keep what you have got." We made that treaty using these words, "inasmuch as receipt of money has never been the object of the said powers," and then take $3,000,000, confessedly seven times as much as the damage we have suffered.

Mr. MYERS rose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I cannot yield; I have only five minutes. We have only $50,000 to pay and we take $750,000 to pay it with, and that, too, when we said the object of our operation was not the receipt of money.

The best thing we can do for the honor of civilization in treating with this nation, which has a marvelous history in the direction of civilization—barbarous, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] calls it—the best thing we can do with it is to say, "We will take no more than is necessary to vindicate our honor. You were fighting with your rebels there; it was one of your rebels who did it. We made you pay the money. It was seven times more than was necessary, and we will give you what remains over." I should like to say and have the historian say that Uncle Sam was always a gentleman.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. HALE, of New York.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 22.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. If any gentleman desires to discuss the bill further in its present form, I am not unwilling to allow the discussion to go on, and will withdraw the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will allow a direct vote to be taken on the bill itself.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is the purpose of the committee to vote down this measure, the only way to reach a direct vote without further discussion or amendments is to move to strike out the enacting clause. As no gentleman seems disposed further to discuss the question, I renew the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 60.

Mr. KELLOGG demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I give notice that when we reach the House I shall demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. G. F. HOAR reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 782) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ships Wyoming and Ta-Kiang, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MYERS. Is it in order to move to disagree with the committee?

The SPEAKER. The first question when a bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with the enacting clause stricken out is will the House concur. If the House concurs, the bill of course is dead. If the House non-concur, the bill is thereby recommitted to its original place on the Private Calendar. But pending that the gentleman may move to recommit the bill to a standing or select committee of the House with or without instructions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question on concurring in the report of the committee.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER. Having entered the Hall just as the committee rose, the Chair does not know who made the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HOLMAN. I made that motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman is entitled to the floor, and to try the sense of the House on the question of concurring with the committee.

The question being put on concurring in the action of the committee in striking out the enacting clause, there were—ayes 98, noes 51.

Mr. MYERS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman that he do not insist on that call.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEGLEY. I renew the call.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to give notice that on Monday I will introduce a resolution to cover the Japanese indemnity fund into the Treasury.

Mr. NEGLEY. I rose in time to renew the demand for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 7; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered and the action of the committee was concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote concurring in the report of the Committee of the Whole; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for a division.

The question being put, there were—ayes 59, noes 71; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, and Mr. STORM.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 59.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Private Calender.

D. B. ALLEN & CO.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $21,543, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for carrying the United States mails between New York and San Francisco in 1864 and 1865, during the suspension of the overland-mail service on the overland route, and provides that the same shall be in full payment for said service.

The report of the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails, have had the same under consideration, and now present the following report:

The Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for the present Congress have submitted a report in this case, which was adopted by the Senate, and which your committee here adopt in the following words:

"The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of D. B. Allen & Co., representing the Atlantic Steamship and the Pacific Mail Steamship Companies, for compensation for carrying the United States mails during the suspension of the overland mail service in 1864 and 1865, beg leave to report:—

"The suspension of the overland mail service, by reason of Indian hostilities on the plains, took place in 1864; that the amount paid for said service annually was $840,000, while $160,000 annually was paid to said steamship companies for carrying printed matter and such letters as might be marked to be specially sent that way.

"When the suspension occurred, leaving the entire Pacific slope without mails, the Postmaster-General applied to said steamship companies to carry the entire mails during the interruption of the overland route. The companies cheerfully complied, and for a period of about four months all mails of the United States for the Pacific were safely and expeditiously transported by them. For this service compensation is claimed.

"The matter has been submitted to the Postmaster-General, who reports that there is justly due D. B. Allen & Co. the sum of $21,543, in strict conformity to the spirit of the law.

"Your committee believe that said parties are justly entitled to a much larger sum; but that sum having been stated by the Postmaster-General as due, and as the parties mentioned prefer to take that sum rather than to provoke controversy and incur delay, will accept the sum in full discharge of the claim, report a bill for said sum. This claim would have been paid at the time the services were rendered if the Department had been in possession of funds with which to pay the same. A bill passed the Senate during the last Congress for the same purpose."

Your committee also report the additional fact that the same bill passed the Senate during the Forty-first Congress, and received the favorable action of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the bill that passed the Senate during the last Congress received the favorable action of the House Committee on Claims.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETERS AND REED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters and Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be paid to Peters and Reed the balances due them for labor done and material furnished at the Norfolk navy-yard, in 1860, upon the contracts with them personally, and the balances due them as the attorneys in fact of the contractors, John E. McWilliams and F. W. Parmenter, in said navy-yard, during the same time, amounting in the aggregate to $15,170.89, as certified by the engineer in charge and approved by the commandant in June, 1860; and for the purpose aforesaid appropriates the sum of $15,170.89 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. STORM called for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 565) for the relief of Peters and Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860, have had the same under consideration, together with the papers and vouchers in the case, and respectfully report:

The chairman of the sub-committee from your committee addressed a letter to the superintendent of Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department, and received the following reply:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1874.

SIR: The Bureau has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, inclosing certain papers, and asking information in reference to the claim of Peters and Reed, as attorney for F. W. Parmenter and John E. McWilliams, contractors for work at the Norfolk navy-yard.

The remote period at which this claim originated, and the incompleteness of the record, caused by the destruction of the yard during the late war, have caused some delay in answering your inquiries. The records of this Bureau have been carefully examined, with the following results:

On the 1st of July, 1859, a contract was made by the Bureau with John E. McWilliams as principal, and A. M. H. Peters, Washington Reed, and Holt Wilson as sureties, all of Portsmouth, Virginia, for the work necessary to complete the masonry of the victualing establishment at the Norfolk navy-yard. The price to be paid was ten dollars per thousand for laying the bricks, to be paid to John E. McWilliams or his attorney.

On the 26th of August, 1859, a contract was made by the Bureau with F. W. Parmenter, of Troy, New York, as principal, and Sidney D. Roberts and Julius H. Kroehl, both of New York, as sureties, for the construction, erection, and completion of an iron roof to the said victualing establishment. The sum to be paid for this roof was $18,000, to be paid to F. W. Parmenter or his attorney.

In both cases Peters and Reed were recognized as the agents and attorneys of the contracting parties.

With regard to the payments made on McWilliams's contract, it appears from the records of the Bureau that bills to the amount of $13,308.25 were made and paid, except a reservation of $2,661.65, and subsequently one-half of this reservation, $1,330.83, was paid. There is no evidence on the files of the Bureau that the bills for $2,758.73, $2,266.63, or the reservation, $1,330.83, have ever been paid.

The aggregate amount of McWilliams's contract is not stated, the price being ten dollars per thousand for laying the bricks, while the number is not stated; nor is there any information in the Bureau by which it could be ascertained, as all the books and papers in the yard were destroyed when the navy-yard was burned.

The only payments on Parmenter's contract for the roof on record in the Bureau are one of $7,200 and one of $3,600, making $10,800, and leaving a balance of $7,200 to make the $18,000.

It also appears from the records of the Bureau that the bill of $777.99, and one of $175, both for extra work on the roof, were authorized by the Bureau to be paid, but there is no evidence that either of these last three bills were paid.

The bill for $661.71, in favor of Peters and Reed, for bricks, is noticed on the books of the Bureau, but there is no evidence of it having been paid.

In February, 1860, the appropriation for this work was exhausted, and the contractors, through the commandant, applied for permission to go on and complete their work and wait for payment until Congress should make appropriations to pay their bills. To this the Bureau interposed no objection and the parties proceeded with the work and completed their contracts in a satisfactory manner.

In the annual report of 1860 the Bureau asked for an appropriation to pay outstanding liabilities, on account of the victualing establishment and to complete the building; the appropriation was made on the 21st of February, 1861, for payment of liabilities and completing the building, but it was not available until the 1st of July, 1861, prior to which time the act of secession was passed, and the navy-yard at Norfolk was taken possession of by the insurgents in April, 1861, and the Navy Department ceased to have a disbursing officer at Norfolk.

The United States again came in possession of the yard in the latter part of May, 1862; the buildings in the yard had been destroyed by fire and the dry-dock disabled, and, under the emergency created by the exigencies of the war, it became necessary for the Department to avail itself of all the unexpended balances of appropriations to the credit of the Norfolk navy-yard; these balances are all condensed in one sum, and the money expended where needed without regard to former special allotment. The dry-dock was repaired and put in working order, and such buildings and wharves as were indispensably necessary to meet the demands of the service during a state of war were put in order; these, with other objects of most imperative necessity, were paid for out of this general fund.

The above is all the information this Bureau has on this subject. It has no knowledge of the payment of or the correctness of the copies of those bills. If any of them have been paid it is probable that a reference to the books of the Fourth Auditor's Office would show it.

The papers are herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. R. P. RODGERS.

Hon. MARK H. DUNNELL, of Minnesota,
House of Representatives, member of Committee on Claims.

On receipt of the above communication from the Navy Department a letter was sent to the Fourth Auditor of the United States Treasury, to which the following reply was made:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
February 11, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, inclosing the papers in the claim of Peters and Reed, with a report thereon from the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department. The papers and report are herewith respectfully returned.

An examination of the records of this Bureau shows the same result as the report above mentioned, namely: There has been paid on account of work and material on the victualing establishment at Norfolk the sum of $24,108.25 only; and the bills now presented, amounting to $15,170.89, do not appear to have been paid.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

WM. B. MOORE,
Acting Auditor.

Hon. MARK H. DUNNELL,
House of Representatives, member Committee on Claims.

The amount found due and unpaid in the above communications, as well as the items therein given, exactly agrees with the sworn vouchers found among the papers in the case; and also exactly agrees with the amount named in the bill.

Your committee find that there was due from the Government to the claimant, on the first day of January, 1861, on contracts made in 1859 and 1860, the sum of $15,170.89, and further find that this sum remains unpaid.

This indebtedness existed prior to the rebellion. While the claimants took no part in the rebellion, and voted against the ordinance of secession, it is not claimed that they were free from sympathy in the rebellion; yet as this claim had been recognized by the executive and legislative departments of the Government, and in view of the policy adopted by Congress in making payment of the claims of the census-takers of 1860, your committee recommend the payment of the claim. Your committee deem it the better policy to pay individual claims well sustained in fact and equity than pass a general law at the present time which shall admit a whole class irrespective of the merits of the several cases in the class.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STORM. This is a very old claim, and the statement by the Bureau of Yards and Docks is by no means very clear. I ask the gentleman why this claim should have been left hanging so long before any attempt was made to get a bill of this kind, and if the committee had any other evidence before them than is given in the papers embodied in the report?

Mr. DUNNELL. I fear I will not be able to make the matter any plainer than it is made in the report of the committee. This bill came before the Committee on Claims, and as chairman of a sub-committee of that committee I wrote to the Bureau of Construction, and received the reply that has been read. I also wrote to the Fourth Auditor, and the letter of the Fourth Auditor confirmed all that has been said in the letter from the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Those two letters show that there is due to these parties $15,170.89, and that no part of this money has been paid to them. This amount was due to these parties on a contract that was entered into in 1859. The contract was completed in 1860, and, as requested by the Navy Department, Congress, in 1860, made an appropriation to pay this identical sum of money. But prior to the time when the appropriation became payable the rebellion intervened, and these men were not paid because of a quasi participation in the rebellion.

The executive department and the legislative department of the Government have recognized this as a just claim, and the committee have, for reasons which they set out in the closing sentences of their report, deemed it best, on the merits of the case, that are unquestioned, to recommend the passage of this bill. There is not a deviation of one single mill between the amount set out in the petition and the amount shown to be due these parties, and the one letter confirms the other; the first letter confirms to a mill the amount set out in the other.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I beg to say that I am very glad to see precisely the question raised by this bill presented to the committee and to the House, and that is the question whether the United States shall consent or refuse to pay an acknowledged indebtedness on a balance struck to a person who was a resident of the States recently in rebellion, on the ground that he had been a rebel against or an enemy of the United States—an indebtedness occurring before the war. That question I know has heretofore, to some extent, been considered an open one. I believe for one that the time has come to settle it once for all as a matter of principle, and I hope there remains nobody in this House or in this committee who is not in favor of paying the honest debts of the United States, whether the man to whom the debt is due was a rebel or a loyal man.

Mr. STORM. I agree with the gentleman on that point. I only addressed the question I did to the gentleman from Minnesota because it struck me that this was a very old claim.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to state what I understand to be the facts in the case, inasmuch as the gentleman from Minnesota did not strike the right point in the case. As I understood the case in the committee, and as I now understand it, the party making this claim lived in the State of Virginia, and by a law of Congress all persons living within States in rebellion were cut off from applying to the Court of Claims or being paid by any Departments of the Government. It is simply because the statute of limitations runs against the claim that they could not bring it before the Court of Claims; but I understand the fact to be that the parties were loyal.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The report shows that they were disloyal.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That was my understanding, and they were simply debarred from prosecuting their claim because they lived within the limits of a State which was in rebellion and the law of Congress deprived them of the right of either bringing suit in the Court of Claims or being paid by a Department.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DUNCAN MARR.

The next bill upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2683) for the relief of Duncan Marr, a loyal citizen of Montgomery County, Tennessee.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Duncan Marr, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,024, the same to be in full satisfaction of his claim for wood and brick taken from him near Clarkesville, Tennessee, the quantity having been ascertained and reported on by the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] desires to bring before the House a question of privilege, and therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. G. F. HOAR reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report sundry bills to the House.

D. B. ALLEN & CO.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL. I was absent, Mr. Speaker, engaged in the performance of duties on the Committee on Banking and Currency, when this bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. This bill has been repeatedly before Congress since I have been a member and has been repeatedly defeated. My memory does not serve me to give accurately to the House the various objections which exist against the claim. I had them at one time and stated them to the House during a former Congress. I considered the reasons against the passage of the bill at that time and the House considered them as sufficient to justify adverse action on the claim. I will move therefore that the bill be recommitted to the committee from which it emanated with a view to have an adverse discussion upon it, at least so far as I am able to make it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The report of the Committee on Claims was presented and read to-day when the bill was before the Committee of the Whole and no member of the committee rose to make any objection to the bill; thereupon it was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. In answer to what the gentleman says in reference to previous action upon this claim, I think I am well advised when I say that neither House has acted adversely upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. Has it not been before Congress before, and has it not been adversely reported on?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Not so far as I can find from the records of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I know I defeated it twice.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If I have the floor, I desire to be allowed to proceed with my remarks. This claim has been reported upon five times favorably in the Senate and has passed the Senate three or four times. It was also acted on favorably by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House. It was also acted on favorably by the Committee on Claims in the last Congress. It has now been acted on favorably, and I know of no reason why it should be recommitted. I believe the bill is a meritorious one. I have carefully examined it, and I think it ought to pass and ought not to be recommitted now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Claims in the last Congress reported favorably upon this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The records of the committee show that they did.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it was gotten out of that committee in some way or other.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken. I call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will not second the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That will test the sense of the House upon the question as well as any other vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I have entered a motion to recommit the bill to the committee which reported it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion to recommit should be to the Committee of the Whole, from which the bill has been reported.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair is corect.

The SPEAKER. The first question, if the previous question be seconded, will be upon that motion.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The question was put on the motion to recommit; and on a division there were—ayes 38, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. BURROWS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 25, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETERS AND REED.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was a bill (H. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters and Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have been instructed by the special committee on affairs in the Southern States, of which I have the honor to be chairman, to submit a report in writing, and to move that it be printed and recommitted to the committee. I desire to state further that at the same time that this report was authorized to be made the committee determined to proceed forthwith to the State of Louisiana to continue the investigation.

The motion was agreed to.

SESSION OF TO-MORROW.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it be in order to move to set aside the order which was made some time since and earlier in the day that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider was agreed to in that case.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not propose to reconsider the order. But cannot I introduce a substantive proposition to set that order aside and have a session on Saturday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it might be done in regard to future Saturdays, but not for the Saturday of the current week.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the Chair will entertain such a motion, I will submit it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is that the order made during the session to-day, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, be rescinded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how that can be done. The order was made and the motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the order was laid upon the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is not that a proposition that may be rescinded by subsequent action of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The House has taken the only two votes that can be taken upon it, the direct vote affirming the order and then a vote tabling the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there no possible method by which we can have a session to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It is very difficult to get the House in a condition where it cannot hold a session, if the majority so choose. The House can take a recess till to-morrow, and carry the Friday session up to next Monday noon; but in no other way.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege, but before bringing it before the House I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] who desires to introduce a bill for reference.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4342) in relation to the Quartermaster's Department, fixing its status, reducing its number, and regulating the appointments and promotions therein; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen who desire to have bills referred should remember that unless it is very necessary to have their bills before committees on Monday morning, all the States will be called on that day for bills for reference.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is upon the floor on a question of privilege.

RECUSANT WITNESS—RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Mr. DAWES. I regret that I am compelled so frequently to ask the attention of the House to a matter that has consumed so much of our time. But it is due to an officer of this House if we impose upon him an unusual duty, not only to clearly and distinctly define the duty itself, but also to make known to those whom it may affect our determination to protect that officer in the discharge of that duty.

I have a report from him that in obedience to the order of the House made last night he, with counsel, appeared before the judge who had commanded him to produce in court the body of Richard B. Irwin, and there laid before the judge the proceedings of the House on yesterday upon the subject. He made return to the court as he was commanded, and fully set forth that he held Richard B. Irwin under an order of this House, growing out of proceedings wherein he had been adjudged guilty of contempt, and declined to produce his body in court. The judge was willing to hear a reargument of the case, and after deliberation delivered an opinion insisting upon the production of the body of Irwin in court. The case was continued until to-morrow for the purpose of further advisement on the part of the Sergeant-at-Arms. It was argued before the court that the order passed by the House last night did not require of the Sergeant-at-Arms that he should still retain the custody of Mr. Irwin; that it went no further than to command him to make as a part of his return the proceedings of the House under which he held the witness, inasmuch as a portion of the original order which did require him to retain the custody of this person was stricken out by order of the House. The original order was in the following words:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of the said Irwin before said court when making such return and retain said Irwin, and continue to hold him subject to the further order of this House.

It will be remembered that the House struck out of this order all after the word "contempt," so that as adopted by the House it reads in these words:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return of the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt.

The counsel for Mr. Ordway construed this order as commanding him to make substantially that return and no more, and still to retain the body of Mr. Irwin. I so understood it, and it was not until my attention was called to it by counsel themselves that it occurred to me there could be any doubt on the point. I said to the counsel that I thought they, upon reading the proceedings of the House last evening, would entertain no doubt upon the subject; and they have proceeded to-day upon that construction.

It is due, however, to the Sergeant-at-Arms that, if we order him to hold the body of this man, we should say so in so many words. Under the advice of that officer's counsel the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has a resolution which he proposes to offer, which will make the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms perfectly clear if the House shall determine to adhere to what was intended, I believe, to be its decision last evening.

I do not desire to discuss again the merits of this case. I would simply call the attention of the House to a single authority—a case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States—in which that tribunal expressly declares that it is the duty of such an officer as this, when a writ of habeas corpus is served upon him from another jurisdiction, to make known in his return that he holds the party in custody under the authority of the United States; and it is his duty thereupon to disobey the order of any other jurisdiction that seeks to take the party out of his custody. I read from the head-note in the case of Abelman vs. Booth and The United States vs. Booth, 21 Howard, 506:

3. When a writ of habeas corpus is served on a marshal or other person having a prisoner in custody under the authority of the United States, it is his duty, by a proper return, to make known to the State judge or court the authority by which he holds him. But, at the same time, it is his duty not to obey the process of the State authority, but to obey and execute the process of the United States.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Taney uses this language:

In the case before the supreme court of Wisconsin, a right was claimed under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the decision was against the right claimed; and it refuses obedience to the writ of error, and regards its own judgment as final. It has not only reversed and annulled the judgment of the district court of the United States, but it has reversed and annulled the provisions of the Constitution itself and the act of Congress of 1789, and made the superior and appellate tribunal the inferior and subordinate one.

We do not question the authority of State court, or judge, who is authorized by the laws of the State to issue the writ of habeas corpus, to issue it in any case where the party is imprisoned within its territorial limits, provided it does not appear, when the application is made, that the person imprisoned is in custody under the authority of the United States. The court or judge has a right to inquire in this mode of proceeding for what cause and by what authority the prisoner is confined within the territorial limits of the State sovereignty. And it is the duty of the marshal or other person having the custody of the prisoner to make known to the judge or court, by a proper return, the authority by which he holds him in custody. This right to inquire by process of habeas corpus, and the duty of the officer to make a return, grows, necessarily, out of the complex character of our Government, and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its powers, and each within its sphere of action prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. But, after the return is made and the State judge or court judicially apprised that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further. They then know that the prisoner is within the dominion and jurisdiction of another government, and that neither the writ of habeas corpus nor any other process issued under State authority, can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties. He is then within the dominion and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If he has committed an offense against their laws, their tribunals alone can punish him. If he is wrongfully imprisoned, their judicial tribunals can release him and afford him redress. And although, as we have said, it is the duty of the marshal, or other person holding him, to make known, by a proper return, the authority under which he detains him, it is at the same time imperatively his duty to obey the process of the United States, to hold the prisoner in custody under it, and to refuse obedience to the mandate or process of any other government.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to say that Judge MacArthur had delivered a written opinion on this question. I ask the gentleman whether a copy of that opinion is in his possession?

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to say a written opinion. I understand that it is an oral one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is anything clear in judicial decisions it is that where a court has made a judgment upon a question of contempt, there is no appellate court, no superior court, that can revise its decision; in that respect it is the highest and the only tribunal that can pass upon the question; every other tribunal is in reference to that court and that question an inferior and a foreign tribunal.

Now, this supreme tribunal, quoad hoc, so far as this matter is concerned, having no superior, there being no court or power competent to review its decision, has decided that this man Irwin is in contempt, and has issued its warrant in obedience to its judgment, to hold him. Another tribunal, a foreign tribunal, has issued a writ of habeas corpus upon his petition. Now, whether his petition disclosed the fact that he was so held by the officer or not, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that it is the duty, and the only duty, of the officer to disclose in a proper return that he does so hold the man by such a judgment, in making which we are accountable to no other tribunal whatever; and upon making it appear in his return, it is his duty to hold and retain this person and to disobey any mandate that requires him to release that custody.

Now, the Supreme Court has also said that if you bring this man into court in obedience to that writ, you do thereby and at that moment release him from your custody and lose all control over him. The Supreme Court has declared that it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to disobey any mandate of a court the effect of which is to release his hold of this prisoner; and therefore, if this House desires the further custody of its witness, the Supreme Court has told you how to retain that custody.

I have in my hand a copy of the petition for the writ of habeas corpus and also a copy of the return made to it, both of which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The documents are as follows:

To the honorable the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia:

The petition of Richard B. Irwin, a citizen of the State of California, respectfully represents, that he is now restrained of his liberty and detained in confinement by N. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; that the said N. G. Ordway claims to act under the authority of the House of Representatives and by virtue of an order issued to him by the Honorable JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives, commanding him, the said Ordway, to take your petitioner into his custody and confine him in the jail of this District.

Your petitioner further shows that the material facts concerning his detention, as he understands them, are that he was summoned before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and questioned concerning certain matters alleged, but erroneously, to be relative to an investigation of an alleged improper use of money to obtain from Congress a subsidy for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, which questions petitioner declined to answer, because the committee had no authority or legal right to propound them; that your petitioner was then taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, and on the 7th day of January, A. D. 1875, brought to the bar of the House, where certain questions were propounded to him, which he refused to answer, because the House of Representatives had no legal right to propound such questions; and on his refusal he was again ordered into custody and confinement, to the end that proceedings in due course of law might be instituted against him by the district-attorney of the United States for this District, under the act of January 24, 1857. (11 United States Statutes-at-Large, 155, 156.)

Your petitioner respectfully represents that his arrest and confinement are contrary to law and in violation of his constitutional and legal rights as a citizen of the United States.

Wherefore he prays, the premises being considered, that your honor will be pleased to issue a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, directed to the said N. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, commanding him, at such time and place as your honor may signify, to have before you the body of the petitioner, to the end that the cause of his detention may be investigated, and that he be discharged from further detention, or such other relief be entered in the premises as to law and justice may pertain. And as in duty bound, &c.,

RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Richard B. Irwin, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that the facts set forth in the foregoing petition are true.

RICHARD B. IRWIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 8th day of January.

CHARLES WATTER, J. P.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, to wit:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To N. G. ORDWAY, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to have the body of Richard B. Irwin, detained under your custody, as it is said, together with the day and cause of his being taken and detained, by whatever name he may be called in the same, before one of the justices of the supreme court of the said District, at the city hall, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Tuesday, the 12th day of January, 1875, at twelve o'clock (noon) of said day, to do and receive whatever shall then and there be considered of in this behalf; and have then there this writ.

Witness Arthur MacArthur, one of the justices of said court, the 9th day of January, 1875.

By order of Justice MacArthur.

[L. S.]

R. J. MEIGS,
Clerk.

To Hon. ARTHUR MACARTHUR,
Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia:

The undersigned, Nehemiah G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, respectfully represents, that in obedience to the command of the within writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum the undersigned makes the following return, to wit:

That ever since the first Monday in the month of December, in the year of our Lord 1873, the undersigned has held and still continues to hold; the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives aforesaid; that the said House of Representatives was in session at the time of the arrest of Richard B. Irwin, the relator named in said writ, and was for a long time before that, and also thereafter, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned, lawfully in session.

That prior to the 21st day of December, A. D. 1874, and when said House was duly in session in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, the said House duly referred to one of its standing committees, to wit, to the Committee on Ways and Means, the investigation of a certain matter coming within the constitutional and legal cognizance of said House and within its power to make inquiry, and among which was investigation into, that is to say, the subject matter of the use and employment of money for the purpose of procuring legislation by the Congress of the United States in aid of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and that in order to facilitate and make effectual said investigation and inquiry when so duly in session as aforesaid, passed an order or resolution in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers and administer oaths in all matters from time to time pending and under examination before said committee."

And that afterward, and in virtue and pursuance of the authority of said resolution and of the power of the said committee acting as the duly-constituted organ of said House, the said committee duly summoned and caused to appear before it the said Richard B. Irwin to give testimony before said committee touching certain matters pertinent to the aforesaid subject-matter of inquiry then pending before said committee, and that the said Richard B. Irwin was then and there duly sworn according to law to give testimony before said committee pertinent to said subject-matter then and there under investigation as aforesaid before said committee, and that the said Richard B. Irwin was then and there required by said committee to disclose the names of the persons whom he employed to aid him in procuring the subsidy from Congress in 1872 for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and was asked by said committee what was the largest sum paid by him to any one person to aid him in procuring that subsidy; and that the said Richard B. Irwin, then being under examination as such witness as aforesaid, wholly refused to answer said question and to make said disclosure so required of him by said committee as aforesaid; which conduct and refusal to answer as aforesaid was by the said committee afterward, to wit, on the 21st day of December, 1874, and while the said House was duly in session, reported to the said House for its action thereon; and that the House of Representatives aforesaid thereupon then and there, in the exercise of its constitutional and legal jurisdiction and power and touching the subject-matter so reported to it by said committee, made and passed the following order, that is to say:

"Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Richard B. Irwin and him bring to the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the mean time keep the said Irwin in custody to await the further order of the House."

And that in pursuance of the order of said House last aforesaid this respondent, as Sergeant-at-Arms as aforesaid, by virtue of a warrant to him duly issued in pursuance of said last-mentioned order, brought before the bar of said House on the 6th day of January, 1875, and while said House was in session as aforesaid, the said Richard B. Irwin, who was then and there fully heard by said House upon the matter named in said order last mentioned, on which he was required to show cause as in said order stated; and that thereupon the said House adopted the following order, that is to say:

"Resolved, That the Speaker propound to the witness at the bar the following questions:

"First. Give the names of the persons whom you employed to aid you in procuring the subsidy from Congress in 1872 for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

"Second. What was was the largest sum paid by you to any one person to aid you in procuring that subsidy?"

And that upon and after the adoption of said last-mentioned order by the said House, to-wit, on said 6th day of January, 1875, and while the said House was in session, and the said Richard B. Irwin was so present at the bar thereof in pursuance of the action of said House in causing him to be brought before the bar of said House to show cause as aforesaid, the Speaker of said House propounded to him, the said Richard B. Irwin, the interrogatories in said last-mentioned order contained; and the said Richard B. Irwin then and there refused to answer the first interrogatory contained in said last-mentioned order; and that the said House, after having heard and considered the causes then and there shown by said Richard B. Irwin why he should not be punished for contempt of the authority of said House, and after the said Richard B. Irwin had refused to answer said first-named interrogatory in said last-mentioned order contained, to wit, on said 6th day of January, 1875, and after he had refused to answer the same before said committee as aforesaid, adopted in the premises aforesaid the order following, that is to say:

"Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin, having been heard by the House of Representatives pursuant to an order heretofore made, requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee and by the Speaker of this House in obedience to its order, has failed to show cause why he should not answer the same; and that said Richard B. Irwin be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto."

And that the said House of Representatives afterward, on the said 6th day of January, 1875, and while said House was still in session and in the exercise of its constitutional and lawful powers as the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, and in execution of the order and judgment of said House declaring "that said Richard B. Irwin be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer," passed the order following, that is to say:

"Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to abide the further order of this House, and while in such custody he be permitted to be taken by the said Sergeant-at-Arms before the Committee on Ways and Means if he should declare himself ready to answer such questions as may be lawfully put to him, including those asked of him by order of this House; and while he shall so remain in custody, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the witness in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia."

And that afterward, to wit, upon the same 6th day of January, 1875, in pursuance and execution of the order contained in the resolution last aforesaid, and in virtue of the authority and power thereby conferred and of all the premises aforesaid, JAMES G. BLAINE, he the said JAMES G. BLAINE then and there being the Speaker of said House of Representatives, executed, and Edward McPherson, he the said Edward McPherson then and there being the Clerk of said House, attested, the warrant of said Speaker, under the seal of said House, and prior to the arrest and detention of the said Richard B. Irwin delivered the said warrant to this respondent, as Sergeant-at-Arms of the said House, and that in obedience to the warrant aforesaid and the order and command of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, duly and lawfully made in open session of said House, this respondent, as Sergeant-at-Arms as aforesaid, and as in duty bound to do, did, on said 6th day of January, 1875, arrest and now holds the body of the said Richard B. Irwin in custody, and now here produces and exhibits the said warrant, precept, and order as the cause of the caption and detention by him as aforesaid of the body of the said Richard B. Irwin as part of this respondent's return.

And this respondent herewith also submits a duly-certified copy of the order of said House, passed on the 21st day of December, 1874, hereinbefore referred to, with a duly-certified copy of the warrant of the Speaker of said House issued thereon, as also duly-certified copies of the resolutions of said House passed on the 6th day of January, 1875, hereinbefore referred to.

The respondent having answered fully the said writ and shown that the legal custody of said Richard B. Irwin is in the said House of Representatives, under the due exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction, prays that this proceeding be dismissed, and the said custody of said House, and of this respondent as its officer, shall in nowise be interfered with by virtue of this proceeding.

OFFICE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
December 21, 1874.

To NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY, Esq.,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives, United States.

SIR: The following order was this day adopted in the House of Representatives:

"Ordered, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Richard B. Irwin, and him bring to the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and in the mean time keep the said Irwin in his custody to wait the further order of the House."

Now, therefore, I, JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, do hereby command you to execute the foregoing order of the House.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the House of Representatives to be hereto affixed the day and year first above written.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS,
Second Session.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 6, 1875.

On motion of Mr. DAWES,

Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer the questions propounded to him by the committee and by the Speaker of this House in pursuance of its order, has failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer the same, and that said Richard B. Irwin be considered in contempt of the House for failure to make answer thereto.

Attest:

EDWARD McPHERSON,
Clerk.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS,
Second Session.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 6, 1875.

NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY, Esq.,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives of the United States:

SIR: Whereas the House of Representatives this day passed a resolution as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That Richard B. Irwin be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms to abide the further order of this House, and while in such custody he be permitted to be taken by the said Sergeant-at-Arms before the Committee on Ways and Means, if he shall declare himself ready to answer such questions as may be lawfully put to him, including those asked of him by order of this House; and while he shall so remain in custody the Sergeant-at-Arms shall keep the witness in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia."

Now, therefore, I, JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives, do hereby command you to execute the order of the House as contained in said resolution, and the body of the said Richard B. Irwin to safely keep in your custody pursuant to the said order of the House of Representatives.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the House of Representatives to be affixed the day and year first above written.

Mr. CESSNA. I want to put a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] Suppose that Judge MacArthur, after a full hearing of all the facts and a full examination of the law, should decide to remand Irwin to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, do we thereby lose control of him?

Mr. DAWES. We should thereby regain control of him. But suppose the judge should decide otherwise?

Mr. CESSNA. Very well; is not the gentleman willing to trust the courts of the country to decide this question upon full examination of all the facts and the law?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether he has any information as to the grounds on which Judge MacArthur claims to act. My desire is to obviate any unseemly clashing between the jurisdiction of the two authorities.

Mr. DAWES. It is due to the court that I should say that neither the counsel for Mr. Ordway nor the committee nor anybody else has any opinion that this judge is desirous of doing anything beyond what seems to him to be his plain duty.

There is no intimation from any quarter I know of that the judge is acting otherwise than according to his convictions. So far as we learn his opinion it is this: that although the petition for the writ of habeas corpus may substantially set out the fact this man is held because of proceedings for contempt against him by the House of Representatives, and although he might be willing to concede if that stood alone upon the paper he would not go behind that, yet that the petition also contains an allegation that the proceedings for contempt were of such a character as ought not to have resulted in a judgment for contempt, namely: The allegation is that we put questions to him, both the committee and the House, which neither the committee nor the House was authorized to put to him, and therefore a refusal to answer those questions was not a contempt. The answer to that, made by the learned counsel who appeared for Mr. Ordway, and which seems to me to be conclusive, is that the House are the sole judges of what does constitute a contempt, and they have entered up judgment that they were authorized to put these questions, and refusal to answer them is a contempt, and therefore this man is properly adjudged in contempt. Therefore, whether it was frivolous for the judge of this inferior court to go behind or to be asked to go behind it and judge of the sufficiency of it, is to concede the whole case upon which the House of Representatives stands, namely, that they are the sole judges of what constitutes a contempt.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps before my colleague speaks to the question it will be better to allow the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to offer his resolution, so that it may be before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, before sending up the resolution or it is read, in order it may be more readily understood, I wish to say that owing to the language of the statute, which seems imperative, in the opinion of the judge, that at the time of making the return the body should be produced, it has been thought expedient we should provide for the facts upon our record to be presented respectfully to the judge in person, under the advice of his counsel, when it is believed by the counsel and by the members of the committee who have considered the subject, the judge will then have before him the record of this tribunal, which meets any question of doubt which may arise on the allegations of the petition, while at the same time, not being a formal technical return, it does not raise the question of the production of the body. The object of these orders, therefore, is twofold: first, to make the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms specific; and secondly, to treat with all proper respect the judge who has the question before him by having these facts presented to him. I wish to answer it upon careful consideration, and with the approval of his counsel, who I believe are well known to the members of this House as competent to give a sound opinion.

Mr. DAWES. Now let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the matter of the proceedings against the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House for the production of the body of Richard B. Irwin, held in his custody for contempt of the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the aid of counsel, make known to the judge issuing the writ of habeas corpus requiring the body of Richard B. Irwin to be brought before the said judge, that he, the said Sergeant-at-Arms, has said Irwin in his custody pursuant to an order of this House upon its judgment that the said Irwin was in contempt of the House of Representatives, and for no other reason. That the House of Representatives requires of him to retain the body of said Irwin in his custody until the said Irwin shall offer to purge himself of said contempt, as provided by the order of this House, and that he respectfully inform the judge that, as an officer of this House, he cannot disobey the orders thereof in this respect by releasing in any way or transferring said Irwin from his custody; and further Ordered, That he exhibit to the said judge a copy of the order of this House, duly certified by the clerk, adjudging the said Irwin in contempt, and the warrant of the Speaker in execution thereof, together with a copy of this order.

Mr. KASSON. It is proper I should add that there is a clause in the petition falsely asserting the witness is held to await further proceedings under the statute of 1867, which requires the intervention of a court and grand jury. We understand the point which is made upon the mind of the judge. Hence the language here which we think both the Sergeant-at-Arms and the judge are entitled to have in due form that it was for contempt and for no other reason. I believe that is all I have to say.

Mr. DAWES. Before I yield to my colleague, as this discussion was somewhat protracted last night, now, in order that it may be as brief as possible, I ask him to specify the time he wishes to occupy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusettss. I am not going to take a long time.

Mr. DAWES. When we get to talking, and I do not mean my colleague particularly, but all of us, it is hard to put a stop to it. Will my colleague be content with five or ten minutes?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me go on in my own time.

Mr. DAWES. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I had supposed, when the question of personal liberty, the question of the action of the writ of habeas corpus was to be discussed, we might at least have had it calmly, carefully, and fully discussed. And the reason why I thought so was that precedents that arise from the passions of men very frequently interfere, as precedents, with judgments of men long afterward; and I think there is no better illustration of this than the fact that is before the House that a radical republican quotes the decision of Chief Justice Taney in Booth's case as a rule of guidance in a republican House. If there was anything that was especially denounced at the time—I thought wrongfully then and I think wrongfully now——

Mr. DAWES. Will my colleague include in the criticism of that precedent a criticism of a decision of the present court in 13 Wallace, where it has been unanimously reaffirmed?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that courts follow precedents, and I am glad to see that my colleague has got so good a shelter as he has.

But the case of Booth does not touch this case at all. Let us examine it a moment, free from all heat and passion. I certainly have not any. And I think, after the disclosures of the other day, it is very evident that I had no desire that Irwin should hold his tongue, in order to shield certain persons who have now been shown to have got a part of this money. They were not such friends of mine that I would undertake to interpose for them. But I speak for personal liberty, the right of the citizen at all times. What is the writ of habeas corpus? It is a great writ, a prerogative writ, not of the king but of the citizen, that wherever he is restrained of his liberty he may be brought before a judicial tribunal and have the cause of his restraint inquired into. That is the writ of habeas corpus, and when it is issued under the law, it is the bounden duty of the marshal of the United States to take the person before the proper tribunal and examine into the legality of his commitment. It was decided in the matter of Keeler—United States vs. Coolidge 1 Gallison—by one of the ablest judges, Judge Washington, that ever sat in a court, that it is in the nature of a writ of error to examine into the legality of the commitment; and the first requisite is that the body of the party, before any examination can be made, shall be brought into the court, and there be subject to the jurisdiction of the court for that purpose. For it would be idle for the court to proceed without having the body before the court. It is a writ of habeas corpus—"Have you the body? see that you have the body before the court." That is the very meaning of the name of the writ. And therefore the writ of habeas corpus is to have the body before a court of competent jurisdiction.

Now in the case Ex parte Booth the State court undertook to interfere with the jurisdiction of the United States court. There were two separate jurisdictions, separate, distinct, and foreign, one undertaking to interfere with the proceedings of the other—two governments undertaking to interfere with each other. Here there is no case of two governments. Here we are all parts of the United States Government. The court is a United States court and the case of Booth does not apply in any of its features. The case of Booth only settles that where a State court undertakes to interfere with a United States court by a writ of habeas corpus, it cannot do it any more than a writ of error can be brought into a State court from the decision of a United States court and vice versa; a United States court cannot interfere with the jurisdiction of a State court on a State question, any more than a writ of error can be brought from a State court into a United States court. That case therefore does not at all apply.

Now, what is this case? Admit we are a court for this purpose—but that I should deny, if I were called upon for an opinion on that question—admit we are a court for this purpose; we adjudge a man to be guilty of contempt; if we have adjudged him guilty of contempt rightfully under the laws of the land, and it is to be presumed that we have done so, then the judge brings the man before him, and having him before him looks over our proceedings. If he says they are rightful, the man is to be remanded to our custody. If he finds them wrongful, then it is his bounden sworn duty to discharge him.

Now I want just to call the attention of the House to another point to show how the habeas corpus operates. There is another writ of habeas corpus. This is the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum. But suppose it was a writ of ad testificandum. Suppose it was necessary to get Irwin before the court to get his testimony in a case of life and death. The court can send for him and take him from our custody, hear him as a witness, and remand him back. There is no difference in the action of the two writs, the writ ad subjiciendum and the writ ad testificandum.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The action of the latter writ is not to control the custody at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; it is to control the custody of the witness for a particular purpose.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In subjection to the power that imprisons.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; this is in subjection to the power that imprisons until that power is shown to be wrongful. Now in our State of Massachusetts, where some of our Massachusetts lawyers here have got their impressions, we have provided that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be qualified, in that it shall not issue ex debito justitiæ; that the writ shall not issue, but that the question shall be determined on petition, but after the writ has issued then there is never any power to interfere unless it be in troublous times. The Constitution of our country provides that the whole power of the Government cannot suspend the writ of habeas corpus, cannot interfere with its action; it provides that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety requires it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will hear it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Suppose a court of competent jurisdiction issues a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum, and, when the man is taken before that court for the purpose of testifying, another court having the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus does it and takes that witness off the witness-stand out of the power of the court that is examining him and takes him into the other court to show cause for what he is doing. Is not that this case? Is not the House of Representatives detaining a witness in the course of its judicial proceedings until he will testify?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now let me deal with that very point.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my colleague to be brief.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How can I get along when one colleague asks me a question and another wishes me to close my remarks? Suppose this man were actually testifying, and if he was wrongfully imprisoned by the first power, the one having possession of him, a writ of habeas corpus should issue for his body to take him before a court which would rightly decide that question. It is the very same question that was put to me by the learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] in reference to a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. I say that you in order to get rid of the commitment could take the witness anywhere. The only question I want to raise here is whether one branch of Congress will attempt to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. There is no lawyer here who will look me in the face and say that the body of the man must not be brought before the court when the writ issues so as to have the right to his imprisonment inquired into.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is there not a difference between suspending the writ of habeas corpus and allowing it to be carried into a case where the court has no jurisdiction, to defeat the judgment of the court that has jurisdiction?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; that is a large question. The question whether the court has jurisdiction is one that you have no right to try. A judicial court has a right to try it, and we are to assume that that court will rightly determine it. Some one asks me, suppose they decide it wrong? Well, sir, courts may always decide questions wrong.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is not this House the sole judge of the questions it shall put to a witness?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In 1675 the House of Commons directed the lieutenant of the Tower to make no return to any writ of habeas corpus, and again in 1704 similar directions were given to the sergeant-at-arms. This will be found in May's Parliamentary History, page 76. And the author goes on to show that an order of imprisonment for contempt by either house of Parliament is final and conclusive and no court can go back of it. The power to imprison for contempt is an incident of legislative power. It is essential to its exercise. A judicial court can exercise no legislative power, neither as a principal or incidental authority. A court cannot therefore interfere with, or inquire into, or take control of legislative power. If it do so, it exercises our power—a legislative power. Can our decision in regard to the questions a witness shall answer be revised by a co-ordinate branch of the Government?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is what Judge MacArthur proposes to do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; he does not. He proposes to bring him forward and see whether you put any questions to him.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then he proposes to go back of our sentence, and that he cannot do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; he does not do that He wants to see if there is any sentence, and he cannot adjudicate on that question until he has the body of the man before him. That is the whole of it.

Now, I would like to ask my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] if his committee did not send for the Surgeon-General of the Army and the Surgeon-General of the Navy to examine Mr. Irwin and see if he was in such a condition of health that he could be safely imprisoned in the common jail, and if both these eminent surgeons did not report on that question to the committee that he is not in a fit condition, and if the committee did not refuse to report that fact to the House?

Mr. DAWES. I will say to my colleague——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Just answer that question; I do not want anything else.

Mr. DAWES. Well——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How is it?

Mr. DAWES. My colleague——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; answer my question.

Mr. DAWES. At the proper time I will report all the facts to the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the man should die, it would be too late.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] for ten minutes.

Mr. TREMAIN. There is no member of this House who has a higher regard for the writ of habeas corpus than myself. That writ was imported from England, and we took it with all its incidents. It was a part of the common law.

I took occasion yesterday to say that there were limitations to that writ beyond which it was not proper for any court to pass. I claimed that according to the well-settled law in England, and in America as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and in England as it was well settled at the time of the Revolution, the writ of habeas corpus could never be used to inquire into the validity of a commitment for contempt by a tribunal of competent jurisdiction. And I challenge any gentleman who assails that position to find a case in England or America where a prisoner has been discharged upon habeas corpus when he has been adjudged guilty of contempt by either house of Parliament or by the Senate or the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman——

Mr. TREMAIN. I have but ten minutes, and cannot yield for interruptions. The Supreme Court of the United States has deliberately determined that they would not grant a writ of habeas corpus where a prisoner was imprisoned for contempt. I refer to a case in 7 Wheaton, where the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court was pronounced upon that question. From the petition of the petitioner it appeared that he was in jail, in the custody of the marshal of his district, under a commitment of the court for contempt. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in an unanimous judgment, declared that they could not and would not issue a writ of habeas corpus in such a case, because the judgment of a court upon a question of contempt was absolutely final and conclusive, because every presumption existed in favor of the validity and regularity of their proceedings, and because the writ of habeas corpus, if it could lie, would be in the nature of a writ of error to review the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. In that case, Ex parte Kearney, the head-note is—

> The court will not grant a habeas corpus where a party has been committed for a contempt adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction. In such a case the court will not inquire into the sufficiency of the cause of commitment.

In a most elaborate opinion the court says:

> If, then, we are to give any relief in this case, it is by a revision of the opinion of the court given in the course of a criminal trial, and thus asserting a right to control its proceedings and take from them the conclusive effect which the law intended to give them. If this were an application for a habeas corpus, after judgment on an indictment for an offense within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, it could hardly be maintained that this court could revise such a judgment, or the proceedings which led to it, or set it aside and discharge the prisoner. There is, in principle, no distinction between that case and the present; for when a court commits a party for a contempt, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution; and so the law was settled upon full deliberation in the case of Brass Crosby, lord mayor of London. (3 Wilson, 133.)

In the case there referred to Lord Chief Justice De Grey said:

> When the House of Commons adjudged anything to be a contempt or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution; and no court can discharge, on bail, a person that is in execution by the judgment of any other court. The House of Commons, therefore, having an authority to commit, and that commitment being an execution, what can this court do? It can do nothing when a person is in execution by the judgment of a court having competent jurisdiction. In such a case this court is not a court of appeal.

The lord chief justice further said:

The courts of king's bench or chief barron bench never discharged any person committed for a contempt in not answering in the court of chancery, if the return was for a contempt. If the admiralty commits for a contempt, or one be taken up on excommunicato capiendo, this court never discharges the persons committed.

Mr. Justice Blackstone said:

All courts, by which I mean to include the two houses of Parliament and the courts of Westminster Hall, can have no control in matters of contempt. The sole adjudication of contempt and the punishment thereof belong exclusively, and without interfering, to each respective court. Infinite confusion and disorder would follow if courts could by writs of habeas corpus examine and determine the contempt of others.

The United States Supreme Court continues:

The argument of inconvenience has been pressed upon us with great earnestness. But where the law is clear this argument can be of no avail, and it will probably be found that there are also serious inconveniences upon the other side. Wherever power is lodged it may be abused. But this forms no solid objection against its exercise. Confidence must be reposed somewhere, and if there should be an abuse, it will be a public grievance, for which a remedy may be applied by the Legislature, and is not to be devised by courts of justice. This argument was also used in the case already cited, and the answer of the court to it is so satisfactory, that it would be useless to attempt any further refutation.

In the State of New York we have had this question up, and it received the decision of Judge Kent, where the court of chancery decided that a lawyer was guilty of contempt. Judge Spencer, a judge of the supreme court, issued a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into that committal.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And had him brought before him, did he not?

Mr. TREMAIN. He brought him up and discharged him. What next? The chancellor put him back in commitment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As we might do.

Mr. TREMAIN. The chancellor treated the whole proceeding of Judge Spencer as absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. In the opinion of the court, delivered by Chancellor Kent, overruling the decision of Judge Spencer, one of his own brethren on the bench, he stated that the action of the judge inquiring into that commitment was wholly unauthorized and void. And afterward when the man Yates, who was the attorney who had been adjudged guilty of contempt, brought an action under our statute against the chancellor for ordering him back, (because there was a statute making it a penal offense to do so,) the court of error, by an almost unanimous judgment, decided that the proceedings of Judge Spencer in discharging him were absolutely void and without jurisdiction, and that no action would lie for that sentence.

I will refer, in the first place, to a few remarks of Judge Kent, (4 Johnson, page 69.) He quotes various cases showing that the court had no jurisdiction over a commitment for contempt adjudged by the House of Commons, saying that if there was an abuse of power it was only a case where confidence must be reposed somewhere, and that it could not be more fitly reposed in any body than in the highest judicial department of the Government. He refers to numerous cases in England concerning the exact point. He says, quoting a decision of Mr. Justice Blackstone:

That the sole adjudications of contempts and the punishments thereof belonged exclusively, and without interfering, to each respective court. That infinite confusion and disorder would follow if every court should have the power to examine the commitments of the other courts for contempts. That the judgment and commitment of each respective court as to contempts must be final and without control. It was a confidence that might with perfect safety be reposed in the judges and the houses of Parliament. That the objection as to abusive consequences proved too much, because it was applicable to all courts of dernier resort, and general convenience must always outweigh partial inconvenience.

Then Chancellor Kent concludes by saying:

I entertain the most perfect conviction that the law, as they declared it in this case, was well understood and definitely established as part of the common law of England at the time of our Revolution.

And then when the case came before the court of appeals upon the question whether or not the chancellor was liable to an action at the suit of the officer, it was decided in the case of Yates vs. Lansing (9 Johnson) that—

A person who has been regularly committed by the chancellor for a contempt, and afterward is improperly set at large, may be recommitted by an order of the court of chancery, reciting the original writ or attachment.

* * * * * * * *

The Supreme Court of the United States will not grant a habeas corpus where a party has been committed for a contempt by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Now in this case the writ was obtained either by improvident or intentional misrepresentation. The petition (which I have read) charges that Irwin was committed "to the end that he might be proceeded against before the criminal court of the District." That statement is entirely false. It suppresses, either intentionally or improvidently, the fact that this House had adjudged him to be guilty of contempt, which is the very gist of the whole matter, the essence of the whole thing. Now I submit that if you take this man there upon your return, you yield the entire jurisdiction over him. This House is the supreme and final judge of this matter. I have no feeling whatever about this question. If the House thinks proper to send the body before this judge, the judge may perhaps discharge the case on the ground that he is entirely without jurisdiction; and then the House might order Irwin into its custody again. But why go through the useless form of thus retaking the body instead of showing to that judge how he has been imposed upon, how he has been misled by the petition, as he would see from an authentic copy of the proceedings of the House showing that Irwin has been adjudged guilty of contempt. Hence I am in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. DAWES. I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BURCHARD] for five minutes; and then I will call the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, believing that the Sergeant-at-Arms ought to obey the order of the judge in this case and that in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus he ought to produce the prisoner in court, I wish to say a word or two in reply to some of the remarks that have been made.

This is not a question as to the power of the House to punish for contempt. We all admit that; we all agree that the House has the power to punish for contempt, and to hold a witness in custody for contempt in accordance with its orders. But the question is whether, when a writ of habeas corpus has been issued under the statutes of the United States directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, it is not the duty of the officer to produce the body of the prisoner before the judge in obedience to the writ.

The case of Abelman vs. Booth, in 21 Howard, has been quoted here. That does not decide this question. That decision related to the respective jurisdictions of the State and the United States. In that case it was held that the jurisdiction of the United States and of the State were each as distinct and exclusive, although both had jurisdiction over the whole territory of the State, as the jurisdiction of two contiguous States each within its own territorial limits. If it appeared that the prisoner was held under and in pursuance of the authority of the United States, the Supreme Court held that the State courts and authorities had no right to require the production of his body, and that the officer should simply make written return setting forth the Federal jurisdiction by virtue of which he, the prisoner, was in custody. But in this case the prisoner being held under color of the authority of the United States, it appears to me the case comes within the statute read yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that his body is required to be produced in court by express provision of law.

I do not care for this matter so far as Irwin is concerned. I would prefer to hold him in jail until he shall make a full disclosure. I do not speak from any sympathy for him. But this is a question that rises above any such consideration. It is a question which I think this House ought to deliberately consider before passing upon it; for by our action now we establish an important precedent in relation to the rights of citizens, as well as the powers of the House of Representatives.

I call attention to Tarble's case, (13 Wallace, 397,) where the Supreme Court in reviewing the decision in the case of Abelman vs. Booth say:

All that is meant by the language used is that the State judge or State court should proceed no further when it appears from the application of the party or the return made that the prisoner is held by an officer of the United States under what, in truth, purports to be the authority of the United States.

* * * * * * * *

Their courts and judicial officers are clothed with the power to issue the writ of habeas corpus in all cases where a party is illegally restrained of his liberty by an officer of the United States, whether such illegality consists in the character of the process, the authority of the officer, or the invalidity of the law under which he is held. And there is no just reason to believe that they will exhibit any hesitation to exert their power when it is properly invoked.

There is a broad distinction between the case now before us and the case there cited. That was a question of jurisdiction between two governments, one of which actually held the prisoner under its own laws. This relates to the method of presenting to the court the fact that the prisoner is in custody by order of one branch of the legislative department of the same Government. When there is imminent danger of a collision between two co-ordinate branches of the Government, the legislature and the judiciary, we may well pause to see that we are right in our action; because if the resolution authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to hold this prisoner as against the writ is passed, and we are satisfied that our authority cannot be questioned or even inquired into in regard to any order of imprisonment we make, we must carry out that determination to the utmost, and assert and maintain the authority and prerogatives of the House and of legislative bodies at all hazards.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We on this side of the House have not been heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] declines to yield further, and demands the previous question.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to offer an amendment, or at least to have it read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think that this matter is of too much importance to be passed upon without a single word from this side of the House. We are required to vote on the question, and we are entitled to say something upon it.

Mr. DAWES. I would be very glad to let this subject be discussed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts has not allowed a single man on this side of the House to speak.

Mr. DAWES. That is because the gentlemen here have taken up so much time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. This is an important question and we wish to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. I appreciate the remark of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but he sees the impatience of the House. If the majority desire to continue this discussion they can say so by voting down the demand for the previous question and I will not say a word.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I cannot believe there is impatience on the part of this House when the question of personal liberty is concerned and when it is proposed to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. I cannot believe that there is impatience in deliberating upon such a question.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 73.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move the House take a recess until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] as the parliamentary sequence of the last vote.

Mr. CESSNA. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer my amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is one to which I will agree.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after "Sergeant-at-Arms" and insert "be directed to produce the body of the prisoner before the court as commanded by its order and to obey its judgment in the premises."

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the House for this courtesy and favor. I am glad gentlemen are not as impatient as they were represented to be by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and I think it is becoming that they are not impatient or hasty over so grave and all-important a question as the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by this House. My democratic friends certainly cannot have forgotten the intense feeling and alarm which was created throughout the entire length and breadth of this country when they claimed that the President of the United States had illegally or inconsiderately suspended the writ of habeas corpus. The President of the United States may have had the right under some circumstances to suspend that great writ of liberty, but this House of Representatives has no power, right, or authority, under the Constitution or under any law whatever, to suspend or to interfere in any manner with it. It is a writ above and beyond the legal powers and jurisdiction of either branch of Congress.

I do not propose to occupy more than two or three minutes of the time of this House in what I shall say, though much of the time of all of us might be well spent in considering this grave subject. We cannot afford to determine this great question under a feeling of passion or excitement such as was exhibited last evening when this same question was being considered.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] has argued the question as though the merits of it were before the House. He has shown that courts have decided correctly, in his judgment, in many instances. He has shown high authority where judges were trusted, and where they ought to have been trusted, and when their judgments were right and proper and according to the law. We have another occasion now before us where the judge ought to be trusted, in my judgment, with the full determination of the legal rights of this petitioner.

The only question, as I understand it, before the House at this time is what is the proper legal duty of the executive officer of this House, the Sergeant-at-Arms, in obedience to the writ commanding him to bring before the judge the body of Richard B. Irwin; what is the proper return for him to make to it? That is the only question now here; the only one with which we have anything to do.

With the merits, with all the questions that may be raised upon the return of the writ, with all the questions of legality or illegality of the imprisonment we have nothing at this time to do. The House has acted, and its work is done. There is no proposition to reverse or change its action. If it be legal or illegal, we are not now to consider. What is it that causes all this uneasiness, this sensitiveness? Are gentlemen afraid of what they have done? Do they fear the scrutiny of the judge? Is there any wrong done they would not have brought to the light? All the legal questions involved are to be passed upon by one of your own judges. The republican party created his office and made him judge, and you ought not to fear to trust him. And what has he done?

He has held, as it is represented, that he will require that there shall be a proper return to the writ of habeas corpus, and that as a part thereof the body shall be brought into court. Wherever was there any other, or can there be any other, proper return to the writ of habeas corpus? The statute is explicit, and there is no chance for cavil or mistake. "The persons making the return shall at the same time bring the body of the party before the judge who granted the writ." The person to whom the writ is directed shall certify the true cause of the detention and bring the body before the judge.

That is the law of the land. That is a statute not adopted by this House in an hour of passion and excitement, but by the deliberate action of the entire legislative power of this country.

I care not what the decision may have been in the Wisconsin case. It was much criticised at the time, and the State was in open revolution to the Government of the United States. If not the State, the entire party which sustained that action of the State court was considered at the time and was in fact in open declared rebellion and revolution against the Federal Government. The decision, however, does not conflict at all with the view which we take of this question now. The statute is subsequent. The law is now, whatever it was then, that the return shall be made by representing the facts and taking the body before the judge. I apprehend that statute was passed in order it might be made perfectly clear what should be the duty of the officer or the person holding the prisoner for whose benefit the writ was issued.

But further and beyond that and without regard to the statute, I undertake to say there never was either in England or America a proper return made to a writ of habeas corpus where the body, if in possession, was not taken before the officer who issued the writ. This is the very nature and office of the writ, and it is the only true and consistent execution of it. As early as 1771 the lord mayor of London was committed for contempt. I have the case here in the third volume of Wilson's Reports, page 188; and it is recited in the proceedings as a part of the return that the body is now here in the court before the judge issuing the writ.

And now here, at this day, (to wit,) Monday next, after three weeks from Easterday, in this term cometh the said Brass Crosby in his proper person, under the custody of Charles Rainsford, esq., deputy lieutenant of the Tower of London, brought to the bar here; and the said deputy lieutenant then here returneth, that before the coming of the said writ, (to wit,) on the 27th day of March last, the said Brass Crosby was committed to the Tower of London by virtue of a certain warrant under the hand of Sir Fletcher Norton, knight, speaker of the House of Commons, which follows in these words:

"Whereas the House of Commons have this day adjudged that Brass Crosby, esq., lord mayor of London, a member of this house, having signed a warrant for the commitment of the messenger of the house for having executed the warrant of the speaker, issued under the order of the house, and held the said messenger to bail, is guilty of a breach of privilege of the house; and whereas the said house hath this day ordered that the said Brass Crosby, esq., lord mayor of London and a member of this house, be for his said offense committed to the Tower of London: these are therefore to require you to receive into your custody the body of the said Brass Crosby, esq., and him safely keep during the pleasure of the said house, for which this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given under my hand the 25th day of March, 1771;" and that this was the cause of the caption and detention of the said Brass Crosby in the prison aforesaid, the body of which said Brass Crosby he hath here ready, as by the said writ he was commanded, &c. Whereupon, the premises being seen and fully examined and understood by the justices here, it seemeth to the said justices here that the aforesaid cause of commitment of the said Brass Crosby, esq., to the king's prison of the Tower of London aforesaid, in the return above specified, is good and sufficient in law to detain the said Brass Crosby, esq., in the prison aforesaid; therefore the said Brass Crosby, esq., is by the court here remanded to the Tower of London, &c.

And now what are we doing? What is the real question between this House and the judge? The judge requires that your statutes shall be obeyed; that your Sergeant-at-Arms shall do just what the Congress by its law says he shall do. He requires that the common law and common practice of the courts of England and this country in all such cases shall be followed and carried out. He demands that before he shall decide upon the question of the proper or improper imprisonment of this man he shall be in his presence and under his jurisdiction so that when he comes to a decision he shall be able to dispose of the case as he ought to dispose of it; that he shall be able to do what the law requires. And that is the only question we have to determine on the resolutions pending before us, unless we intend to prejudge the matter and determine what the judge himself shall decide when he comes to consider the case itself.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has handed me May's Parliamentary Law, and referred me to page 76, where habeas corpus is treated of, and asked me to read the passage. May says:

The habeas corpus act is binding upon all persons whatever who have prisoners in custody, and it is therefore competent for the judges to have before them prisoners committed by the houses of Parliament for contempt.

I will not read any further. I suppose what follows is in the same line. Now, the question is can we, composing only one branch of the legislative body, holding a little brief authority, place ourselves above the Constitution and law? Can we, in contempt of the most sacred provisions of the law for the protection of life and liberty, take any persons that we please, imprison them as we will, condemn them to any punishment we see fit; and is there no power by which the prisoner sentenced and adjudged to punishment or imprisonment by us can have an inquiry into whether we have any law or jurisdiction or not? Is it to be tolerated that, whatever the functions of this House may be, when it can pass no law and has no power to change or alter any law, we can rise up and contemn all law? Is our jurisdiction above question or inquiry, when it is an axiom almost that the jurisdiction of all courts and tribunals are open at all times to be ascertained and determined? And shall it be conceded to the House of Representatives alone to strike down at its pleasure this great writ of right and liberty?

The gentleman from Massachusetts told us last night that if he were sitting as judge of the court and had adjudged somebody guilty of contempt, and some other court should say to him that it wanted to determine that question, he would tell that court that he had not got through with the individual; and he supposed that what he would do acting as a judge he would do acting as a member of Congress. But it seemed to me he conceded all that is claimed by this prisoner when he determined after the writ was issued to remove the prisoner. It should indeed be a matter of no concern to us how the case should be determined, only so that it be according to law and for the preservation of the liberty of the citizen.

I do not know what Judge MacArthur will do. I had almost said I do not care what he shall do. I do not know this man Irwin. I never saw him until he was brought before the bar of the House. But it were better, far better, a thousand Irwins, guilty of a thousand contempts, should go unwhipped and unpunished altogether, or even sunk at once to the bottom of the sea, than that we of this House of Representatives, in a moment of anger or passion, should strike down this immortal writ of English and American liberty. Those of you who would here and now give away, impair, or suspend the writ of habeas corpus, cease your cry and denunciation of the President for whatever he has done or may do. He has, as I have remarked already, or may have, a right in some cases or under some circumstances to suspend it. But this House of Representatives cannot, without a violation of all law, under any circumstances or in any case.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] desires me to yield a few moments to him, which I do.

Mr. BECK. I desire to offer a substitute for the pending resolution. I send it to the desk to be read, and will occupy only a minute in speaking to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of the said Irwin before said court when making such return as required by law.

Mr. BECK. I only want to say that that is the resolution adopted yesterday down to the word "contempt." The addition simply requires compliance with the statute, that the person making the return shall at the same time bring the body of the party before the judge who granted the writ. That is the law, and the resolution adopted yesterday has nothing added to it except what is required by that law in the very words of the law itself.

I desire a vote upon that proposition as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA.] I want to say just this: that the question is not up now as to the power of this court over our action. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] seemed to labor as though that grave question was up. It is not. The judge has taken this authority. He has granted the writ. If anybody is in contempt, he is in contempt for granting it. The prisoner is not in contempt for asking for it, and you cannot assume that the judge is in contempt for granting the prayer of that petition. The petition of Mr. Irwin is not before the House. We do not know what he alleged in it. He may have said that the House had judged him in contempt and ordered his ears to be cut off, or that he should be maimed or mutilated or to have inflicted upon him some other cruel and unusual punishment. This House does not know what he alleged in his petition. We do not know it officially, but the law says this: that the court of justice or judge to whom such application is made shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it appears from the petition itself that the party is not entitled thereto.

Now, sir, not knowing what this party alleged in his petition, we are not able to say that this judge has acted either in violation of his duty or corruptly in issuing this writ; and not proposing to interfere with the judge, I see nothing left for the House to do, if it proposes to obey the law, but to order that the body of this man, as required by law, shall be taken before the court. I have not had time to look up the discussion attending the adoption of the law of 1867, but in all human probability it was passed because a court or officer having a man in custody refused to bring the body before the court. The very difficulties that have been suggested in this discussion may have reqnired this law to be passed. But since 1867 the law has been made so that in the case of a writ of habeas corpus the body of the party shall be brought before the court. That is the law. No man can dispute it. If it is not a good law, let Congress repeal it and say that when a man is in contempt of the House of Representatives his body shall not be taken before the court; but while the law stands as it does, I want for one to obey it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. With pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask him the same question that I put to my colleague, who is the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and which he did not answer. Did the Committee on Ways and Means authorize the Surgeon-General of the Army and the Surgeon-General of the Navy to examine this man Irwin and see if his health and life would be endangered by being imprisoned in the common jail, and did those officers examine him and report that in their judgment, as professional men, it was the fact that it would?

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. DAWES. I call my colleague on the committee to order if he discloses the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. BECK. I am compelled to decline to answer that question, because the Committee on Ways and Means have taken no action on that matter.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to my colleague that he wait a little while until we do act upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It will be too late if you wait until the man is dead.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with my colleague in that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK.]

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, what is the precise question before the House? One of the committees of this House, under its authority, is engaged in the investigation of an important question. They have power to bring before them witnesses. This man Irwin being before them in accordance with this authority, and undergoing examination, declined to answer questions propounded to him by the committee. He was brought before the bar of the House, the House then acting in a judicial capacity. He was found in contempt of the House, and was put in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who was ordered to place him in the common jail of the District until he should answer the questions propounded. Now, if the House has jurisdiction in the case, if the witness was legally brought before that committee, and if the action of the House in finding him guilty of contempt was in accordance with the Constitution and the law, if these acts were correct, if we have the power to do what we have done, then the witness is still in our custody. He has refused to answer, and is held for contempt. Now what power is there to take him out of our hands? There is no jurisdiction in any court to disturb the imprisonment of that man so long as this House continues, until the 4th of March next. He may at any time purge himself by coming before the House and answering the questions which have been propounded to him.

Suppose there were a case pending before the Senate of the United States of impeachment of the President or any other officer, and that during the trial a witness was brought there who declined to answer the questions propounded to him by the Senate, and he was committed for contempt until he made answer; is it possible that there is power in any court in this District or elsewhere to take him out of the hands of the Senate and release him from imprisonment? Sir, I deny the jurisdiction of this court. It had no power to issue this writ. When the facts are placed in possession of the House, it will be found that this judge has exceeded his jurisdiction.

Sir, I am in favor of the liberty of the citizen; I am in favor of the right of habeas corpus as much as any man can be, and I will vindicate it and uphold it on all proper occasions; but I hold that this is a case in which we cannot obey the order of the judge.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am sorry to see the gentleman from Ohio so wrong-headed on this question. He has endeavored to call the attention of the House back to the real question under discussion, and I apprehend he has failed as thoroughly as did the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] Like the gentleman from New York, he discussed every question surrounding the real one and all but the real question. The gentleman from Ohio makes a similar mistake to that made by the gentleman from New York. He says that if we have jurisdiction and legally hold this man; if we have, according to the Constitution and law, committed him for contempt, then there is no power that can take him out of our hands. That is the very question, let me say to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] that this court will determine; and knowing Judge MacArthur as I have known him for many years as a circuit judge in Wisconsin, I have perfect faith that he will decide it according to the Constitution and the laws. But my friend says there is no power to take this man out of our hands. Temporarily, under a writ of habeas corpus, the court has the power to take him out of our hands. When an application is made to the judge for a writ of habeas corpus, he cannot deny that writ. It is an American right; it is an English right; a constitutional right; it is a right that we cannot and dare not deny.

Mr. TREMAIN. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Not just now. Let me say further, this House has acknowledged the jurisdiction of the court by several resolutions, one or two of yesterday, and by its action of to-day, by its direction to its Sergeant-at-Arms to make a proper and respectful answer to this writ. As I said before, the only question is as to the return of the writ he ought to make. There was some misapprehension as to what the resolution is; some discussion in the court, as I understand, whether the House by that resolution refused to let the Sergeant-at-Arms take the body before the court. The resolution is silent upon the question. Some gentlemen seem to have understood it one way and some another way. I repeat again, the real question is, what is the proper return for our officer to make to this writ, properly, legally, and constitutionally issued? I will now hear the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood the gentleman to say that there was no power on the part of the judge to withhold the writ of habeas corpus upon the application for it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I say unless the petition shall show that the petitioner is legally held.

Mr. TREMAIN. I want to call attention to the act of Congress. After providing that the petitioner shall set out by virtue of what claim or authority he is detained, it states that the court or judge shall order the writ unless it shall appear from the petition that he is not entitled thereto, Now this petitioner did not tell the truth, or he never would have got the writ. He has obtained it by fraud, and the question is whether he shall have advantage of the fraud.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman in his speech last night, and in the speech which he made to-day, has acknowledged the jurisdiction of the court to issue the writ. Now, unless some other gentleman desires to discuss this question further, I will call the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan for five minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not desire that time. I hold in my hand the first volume of Kent's Commentaries, where this question is discussed. Reference is made in it to the decisions of the various courts of the country, and among them a decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in a case which seems to be very similar to this. I have sent for the authority referred to, but have been unable to obtain it. The Massachusetts house of representatives, the supreme court held, can commit for contempt a party who refuses to attend as a witness to testify before a committee of the house.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know that case.

Mr. BURROWS. The case is like this precisely. The court held in that case—

And the supreme court of the State can inquire on habeas corpus into the propriety of the commitment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA,] who desires to move an amendment.

Mr. CESSNA. I offered an amendment some time since which has been read. In order to simplify proceedings, if it is desirable, I am willing to withdraw it at the point where it was offered and allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to offer his substitute, and then I will move to amend it by adding the following:

And that he be further directed to obey the judgment of said court in the premises.

I agreed to do this only if it met with the approbation of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] in whose right I obtained the floor. I do not wish to argue the question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to perfect the order which I offered, as I believe I have the right to do. I propose to insert after the words "that the said Irwin is in contempt of the House of Representatives in refusing to give testimony as a witness" the words "and is detained pending such examination."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] moves to substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to make careful return to the writ of habeas corpus in the case of Richard B. Irwin that the prisoner is duly held by authority of the House of Representatives to answer in proceedings against him for contempt; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take with him the body of said Irwin befor the said court when making such return, as required by law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] moves to amend the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] by adding thereto the words—

And that he be further directed to obey the judgment of said court in the premises.

Mr. BECK. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to change the word "judgment" to "order;" so that it will read:

And that he be further directed to obey the order of said court in the premises.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment; and upon a division—ayes 32, noes not counted—it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the substitute moved by Mr. BECK; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 72, noes 65.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. DAWES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Before the vote is taken I ask that the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] be read.

The Clerk again read the motion.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. BECK; and there were—yeas 107, nays 64, not voting 117; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Cesana, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—117.

So the motion was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. KASSON (having voted in the negative when his name was called) said: I change my vote to "ay," for the purpose of moving at the proper time a reconsideration, owing to the importance of this question as a precedent. I make this announcement that gentlemen may withhold the usual motion to reconsider and table, and I do not propose to interfere with the judgment in this particular case, but desire to bring up the question on Monday, so that it may be decided deliberately.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I shall, immediately after the result is announced, submit the motion to reconsider and table.

Mr. KASSON. I regard the precedent to be established by this action as very dangerous.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion at this point is premature. The substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has been agreed to; but the House has not yet voted to agree to the original proposition as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. KASSON, as amended by the substitution of the resolution offered by Mr. BECK, it was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House take a recess till half-past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. During the pendency of a vote, where the decision of the question has not been announced, though the division upon it has been announced, a motion for a recess or an adjournment cannot be interpolated; but it can be between the announcement of the result of a vote and a motion to reconsider. The Chair will therefore have to put the question on the motion to adjourn, which has precedence.

Mr. HOLMAN. What effect will the adoption of the motion to adjourn have upon the right to submit the motion to reconsider the last vote?

The SPEAKER. The right to reconsider will continue until the end of the next legislative day. But the Chair desires that members may perfectly understand this matter. If a motion to reconsider were entered and not decided, the operation of the resolution would be suspended. But this resolution has been agreed to; and now if the House should adjourn, the resolution will become operative because the motion to reconsider is not really pending, the motion to adjourn having necessarily been recognized by the Chair before the motion to reconsider was made. If the House now adjourns, it will be precisely tantamount to reconsidering the vote on this resolution and laying the motion to reconsider on the table; because the resolution is imperative upon the Sergeant-at-Arms, and will be operative upon him in his return to the court to-morrow.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose that my motion to reconsider and table was made in good time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] first undertook to submit that motion when the Chair was about to put the question upon agreeing to the original proposition as amended by the adoption of the substitute. When that question had been put and decided, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] moved to adjourn; and this motion was of so high a character that the Chair was obliged to recognize it before the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Was not my motion a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion was on substitution merely, not upon the final adoption of the proposition.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rose, however, and remained on my feet for the purpose of making the motion.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio moved to adjourn first.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry—whether a motion to adjourn or a motion to take a recess has precedence?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it not in order to make a motion for a recess?

The SPEAKER. Not while a motion to adjourn is pending, because this motion is the highest recognized in the proceedings of the House. The Chair will again announce that if the House should now adjourn, the Sergeant-at-Arms will be instructed in accordance with the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. CESSNA. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the court should be in session all day to-morrow and Monday; could not the gentleman from Iowa make the motion to reconsider on Monday?

The SPEAKER. He could; and if the reconsideration should then be agreed to, further progress under the resolution might be arrested.

Mr. CESSNA. I hope, then, we shall finish this question to-night.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House refuses to adjourn——

The SPEAKER. If the House should refuse to adjourn, the first question will be to submit the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the resolution, and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CESSNA. Let us do that.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would not the motion for a recess be higher than that?

Mr. LAWRENCE. If we take a recess until to-morrow, may not this whole subject come up again, so that the House might reverse the decision it has made?

The SPEAKER. If the majority desire it, of course they can.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: Memorial of the yearly meeting of Friends for the western shore of Maryland and adjacent parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, held in Baltimore, in favor of settling national differences by arbitration instead of war, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG: Memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, for an appropriation to erect a prison, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, for the establishment of a post-route from Yankton, via Jamesville, to Childstown, in Dakota Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BARRY: Papers relating to the claim of Allen White, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of J. H. Estes, for additional pay for carrying the mails in the State of Louisiana, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CESSNA: The petition of citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, that Government guarantee the bonds of the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. COBURN: The petition of the Indianapolis Academy of Medicine and other medical societies of Indiana, in behalf of the Medical Corps of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COTTON: The petition of Mary D. Spackman, M. D., and Mary A. Parsons, M. D., of the District of Columbia, that the charter of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia be so amended as to allow all persons graduates from any regularly-chartered medical institution, to practice the profession legally, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. COX: The petition of William Kleingoelz, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER: The petition of 400 citizens of Ohio, asking Congress to aid the construction of the Continental Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HAVENS: Papers relating to the claim of William M. Neece, of Marionville, Missouri, for the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of cavalry, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of 500 citizens of Bureau County, Illinois, for the passage of the bill for the construction of the proposed canal from Hennepin to Rock Island, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, the petition of 300 citizens of Rock Island County, Illinois, of similar import, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. KELLEY: Petitions of citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty taken off leading products in 1872, and for the passage of the currency bill of Hon. W. D. KELLEY, providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LEWIS: Petitions of citizens of the United States, for the refunding of the cotton tax paid in 1865, '66, '67, and '68, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of sundry colored citizens of the South, praying that a Territory may be set apart where they may be safe from outrage and enjoy their civil and political rights, to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of Jacob Weaver and others, for the passage of a law to equalize bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Greble Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, that seamen, firemen, coal-passers, and marines in service of the United States during the rebellion may receive a bounty of $8.33 per month for time of service, payable in money or land, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PACKARD: The petition of Enoch L. Folsom, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of A. C. Rhind, captain United States Navy, to be restored to his proper position on the list of captains in the United States Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. STRAWBRIDGE: The petition of 13 medical societies of the State of Pennsylvania, representing over 600 members, asking increase of rank according to length of service for medical officers of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WELLS: The petition of the Match Manufacturers' Association, for repeal of the tax on matches, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January, 16, 1875.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a petition of citizens of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying the passage of a law defining what shall constitute a gross of matches and providing for uniform packages thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg leave to present a memorial from 204 citizens of Arkansas who served as officers and soldiers in the Army of the Union. As the petition is short, I will read it:

We, the undersigned, Union soldiers in the late war of the rebellion, do hereby heartily indorse and approve the course of Lieutenant-General Sheridan in Louisiana. We are residents of Arkansas, and know the statements made by him concerning the condition of Union men and the terrorism existing in this State to be true in every particular; and that we, the men who served the cause of the Union, carry our lives in our hands to-day, as we have done for the past ten years. We ask the soldiers of the Union who live north of Mason and Dixon's line, irrespective of party, who love the Union cause and revere the Government they so freely offered their lives to save to stand by the cause of the Union, the Constitution, and the laws. With the same feelings and governed by the same motives we are to-day the devoted adherents of human liberty, law, and order as we were then. We denounce the statement made in the Little Rock Gazette of the 10th instant as infamously untrue as regards the sentiments of the Union soldiers of Arkansas.

I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask leave to present the memorial of James Crutchett, Charles Rousseau, J. E. W. Thompson, John Carroll Brent, and numerous other property-holders of Washington, representing that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company use and occupy the streets and obstruct the avenues on the north and northeast of the Capitol, and obstruct various streets: First street and Delaware avenue, from K street north to the foot of Capitol Hill; the crossing of Massachusetts avenue and North Capitol street; the occupancy of D street from Delaware to New Jersey avenue as a general freight depot for the loading and unloading of freight, cattle, hogs, and passengers in the streets on both sides, thereby stopping the filling and grading of said avenues and streets; also preventing the building of an improvement on any of the squares within this large and desirable portion of the city, and many other pretty strong circumstances against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of 125 American merchants and seamen of the port of New York, a petition of 127 merchants and seamen of Norfolk, Virginia, and a petition of 31 seamen of Norfolk, Virginia, praying such legislation as will secure to the sailors and seamen the benefits and advantages of the marine hospital service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of the Free Young Men's Benevolent Association of the District of Columbia, praying to be given authority to sell, in lots, abandoned cemetery grounds, square No. 272 of Washington, District of Columbia, the proceeds to be applied to the expense of providing and maintaining a new place of burial for the bodies removed from said square and for future interments in the new place of burial provided by the association; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of William Royal, an invalid pensioner, praying to be rated in the second class; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Joseph H. Kavanagh, an invalid pensioner, praying to be rated in the second class; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That Abraham Palmer have leave to withdraw from the files his invalid-pension discharge.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1083) granting the right of way for a railroad and telegraph line to the Puyallup Valley Coal Company, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1146) to authorize the issuance of a patent for a quarter section of land in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters and Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860;

A bill (H. R. No. 1317) to enable Ann Jennette Hathaway, executrix of the last will and testament of Joshua Hathaway, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for improved device for converting reciprocating into rotary motion;

A bill (H. R. No. 4202) to enable Mrs. Christiana L. Williams, administratrix of the estate of C. W. Williams, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for improvements in canal locks and gates; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4335) authorizing John Hazletine to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of his patent for a new and useful water-wheel.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails.

BUSINESS OF THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I ask leave to offer a resolution. It is intended to expedite the disposition of business and to prevent the consumption of time arising from a contest among different Senators as to what bill shall be taken up. If it should be the pleasure of the Senate to pass it to-day, we might commence immediately under the rule. Let the resolution be read for information, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That during the remainder of this session, after the call for resolutions shall have passed, business on the Calendar shall during the morning hour be called for by committees in the order in which they stand on the list of committees, and so from day to day; but no committee shall have more than one day in succession.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire if the intention is under that resolution to take up from the Calendar any bills the consideration of which may be objected to?

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea is that each of the committees in the order in which they stand on the list of committees, beginning with the Committee on Privileges and Elections and then the Committee on Foreign Relations, and so on, shall have the morning hour for one day to bring up whatever business the committee thinks most important.

Mr. BOREMAN. Whether the consideration be objected to or not?

Mr. ANTHONY. Under this resolution, bills would not be liable to be put over by a single objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If a bill is not completed during the morning hour, as a matter of course it would go over

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not infringe on the day after the morning hour. The right of the committee expires at one o'clock and the next day the next committee takes the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest the propriety of amending the resolution so as to make the five-minute rule now applicable to a certain other class of business in the Senate apply to that. I move that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only objection to that is that the Committee on Foreign Relations, say, might bring up a very important bill and then we would be subject to the five-minute rule. I ask the Senator whether that might not be dangerous in cutting off debate?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is hardly possible that very important matters, unless they are matters unobjected to, can be disposed of in the morning hour. If the Committee on Foreign Relations should bring up an important matter that required debate, it would be impossible to consider it fully in the morning hour. Therefore the committee would not be likely to take that course, but would be likely to select from the Calendar that class of business which they thought could be easily disposed of in the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the rule as it stands proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island; but when it is proposed to ingraft on that the proposition of the Senator from Maine to make a five-minute rule upon every bill that might be reported during the morning hour, that goes too far, I think. I have no objection to the resolution as first proposed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am indifferent about the five-minute part of it. I am rather inclined to it, although I did not propose it; for I have always observed that when we had a five-minute rule prevailing, if a Senator had anything to say that in his judgment ought to be said, he always had permission to go on. I have never known a five-minute rule to be abused.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not strenuous about my amendment. It occurred to me that it was proper enough, as it was a class of business which we were to transact during the morning hour, and nobody would expect to get a bill through that was open to very lengthy debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Maine had better withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the resolution refers to business on the Calendar. If that be so, I have no objection to it. I would ask the mover of the resolution if it is the intention to go to the Calendar each morning after the call for resolutions shall have passed?

Mr. ANTHONY. To go to the Calendar each morning, but to allow each committee, in the order in which the committees stand on the list of committees, to select such business as that committee may think is most important.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] On that question the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the unfinished business of yesterday comes up at one o'clock, does it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that the new rule ought to commence to-day, because the committees are not prepared for it.

Mr. SARGENT. No; we had better go on with the unfinished business at once.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Committee on Privileges and Elections are prepared, they might present their business now under the resolution.

Mr. MORTON. That committee is not prepared with anything this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. None of the committees is prepared. As a matter of course, this resolution takes us all by surprise.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; I have no objection. Let the rule, by unanimous consent, not be enforced to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the execution of the order will be postponed till Monday.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when the remarks which I was submitting yesterday were interrupted by the motion for a recess, I was attempting to show that there was nothing in the information which we had in reference to the condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana on the morning of the 5th instant to have constituted the military interference with the Legislature of that State a question of a party character; and I was expressing my regret that a party turn had been given in this debate to the question presented to us by the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, or the resolution which preceded it offered by the Senator from Ohio. It is very probable that in attempting further to enforce this position I may repeat some of the views which I expressed yesterday.

The interference with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana was an act of the military power of the Government, directed by William P. Kellogg. It was an act, so far as we had information on the subject, exclusively of the military authorities, which did not necessarily connect the President of the United States directly with it. The military commander at New Orleans was under no obligation to obey the order of Mr. Kellogg, unlawful in itself; he was not his commander-in-chief; and if the President of the United States had not given direction for this act, he could not be held responsible for the act. The fault of the President, if fault there be, was, according to the information which we now have, originally an indiscretion on his part in having placed the Federal troops at the disposal of Mr. Kellogg, claiming to be the governor of Louisiana. He became, however, indirectly responsible, by placing the military authorities of the country under the command of such a man.

As Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, he ought to have known that such a delegation of his authority was wrong toward the Army and would be used to the prejudice and oppression of the people. I am inclined to believe, after reading the message of the President, that if he did not anticipate that such would be the use made of the soldiers in New Orleans by Kellogg, he was perfectly willing they should be so used if it became necessary to perpetuate the Kellogg usurpation and aid the republican party. But if this were not the case, his failure to condemn the military interference with the Legislature, and the excuse he makes for the acts of Kellogg, is an approval of the outrage, which commits him to it as fully as if it was perpetrated by his express orders and direction.

Had President Grant condemned the military raid on the Legislature and openly disavowed the act and punished the perpetrators, he would not have been held responsible to public opinion for anything except the indiscretion of placing the military commander at New Orleans in subordination to such a man as Kellogg. But his failure to disavow the crime and his extenuation of its guilt amounts to an approval and justification of the act. But, sir, even the complicity of the President with this great wrong, whether that complicity had been by express order directing its commission or by approval after the crime had been committed, or, if you please, by a failure to condemn it, would not of itself have implicated his whole party. While it is true as a general rule that the political party supporting the Administration is held responsible for the action of its President, still, I apprehend, if such action is of an exceptionable character, not such as could have been anticipated, his party does not become involved in his act until it is indorsed and approved by his party.

If I am right in these views, there was no reason of a party character which ought to have prevented the republican Senators from uniting cordially with us in disapproving of the military interference with the organization of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; and when the resolution of the Senator from Ohio on this subject was introduced on the 5th instant republican Senators could with great propriety not only have united in calling upon the President for information, but also in denouncing the great wrong which has been done. Such a course on their part would have commanded the admiration of the country. It would have been a devotion to the Constitution and to republican institutions that would have met the approval of mankind and been regarded hereafter as an illustration of the attachment of the Senate to the great principles of republican liberty. Such a course might have caused republican Senators to have broken with the President; but I apprehend that it would have been more likely to have brought the President back to a proper respect for the Constitution, and instead of breaking with the President the result would have been to cause him to pause in his attacks and to restrain the attacks of his subordinates upon the constitutional liberties of the people of this country. The President is not so vain, I apprehend, as to suppose that he could, against the wishes of the republican members of the Senate, take his party with him and be sustained in any act which is an infringement of the rights of the States. Should he be so infatuated, he would find himself the leader of but a small faction of his party, the mere chief of a few camp-followers, who would adhere to him for the sake of the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. He will, I apprehend, even with the adherence of republican Senators, find it very difficult to sustain himself in this act, because while the President may not be directly responsible for this military intervention in the halls of the Legislature of Louisiana, yet inasmuch as he had so disposed of a part of the Army that it could be used for that purpose and did not take precautions to provide against such a use of the military forces which he had placed under Mr. Kellogg, he became indirectly responsible. In speaking of this act, therefore, I speak of it as an act of the President because the President was the Commander-in-Chief of the military forces and the President alone had the right to dispose of those forces, and having disposed of them in a manner which caused them to do this injury to the people of Louisiana and of the whole country, the President, while he may not be directly, is indirectly responsible.

I repeat that even with the adherence of the republican members of the Senate the President will find it difficult to sustain himself in this act, because I do not believe that the great body of the republican party are so indifferent to their liberties, so indifferent to the continuance of republican government in this land, as to justify and approve and indorse military interference with the Legislature of Louisiana, notwithstanding republican members of the Senate may desire to carry their party in that direction.

The question, therefore, as it came to us on the 5th instant, was not a party question. It ought not to have been so considered. It was emphatically an American question, involving the very fundamental principles of American liberty, and it ought to have been so treated by the Senate. It is still such a question, rising far above party interests; and if I mistake not the murmuring of discontent throughout the land, it will be so considered by the people of the country. I regret exceedingly that there should have been any division of sentiment in this Chamber in reference to what I consider the greatest outrage of the times, the greatest public crime of the day.

I regret it the more because the division of opinion here, will be calculated to divide the opinion of the country to some extent. While I have no doubt that the general voice of the American people will be heard in condemnation of the wrong, yet I regret that there should be any division of public sentiment in reference to a crime of such magnitude against public liberty as that which has been perpetrated in New Orleans. This quasi indorsement of the action of the military authorities in invading the hall of the house of representatives of Louisiana, and expelling therefrom five members, at the point of the bayonet, will weaken, to a certain extent, the attachment of those who follow the lead of gentlemen who give it their indorsement to republican institutions, and prepare their minds to accept and approve of a centralization of power in this Government.

Upon the issue the two parties in the Senate are joined, the democratic party condemning, disapproving, denouncing in most emphatic terms this invasion of the rights of a sovereign State of this Union, while our republican friends, by their quasi indorsement of and failure to disapprove this great wrong, have placed themselves on the other side. The issue then is, whether republican government is to continue in this land, whether the reserved rights of the States are to be respected, or whether the executive department of the General Government shall at pleasure by military power control the organization and existence of State Legislatures. That is the question distinctly made. That we may properly understand this issue, let us look fairly at the facts as they are known to exist.

For two years there has existed over the people of Louisiana a government, not of their choice, but forced upon them and sustained over them by the power of the Federal Government. Against the existence of this government the people of Louisiana have protested in every possible way. They have appealed to the President, but have been repulsed with insult and denied a respectful hearing; and for the truth of that assertion I refer to the telegram of the Attorney-General, informing the committee of two hundred who were appointed by the democrats of New Orleans to come and see the President, in which telegram the Attorney-General told them that their visit would be useless; that they need not come; that the President had made up his mind, and the sooner they acquiesced in his determination the better. That was the substance of the telegram.

They have petitioned Congress for a redress of grievances, but their appeal has been unheeded. They have been left to the tender mercies of a rapacious and cruel government, sustained over them by the military power of the Government of the United States. They have been restive and dissatisfied under such a government, and would have been unworthy the name of men if they had been otherwise. I know that in this debate there have been intimations and declarations that they ought to have submitted; that they ought, in the language of Senators, to have surrendered to Mr. Kellogg. But, sir, I say here, standing in my place in the Senate of the United States, that if the people of Louisiana firmly believed that Mr. Kellogg's government was forced over them, that he was not their choice, that there was a premeditated determination to place the usurper over them and to trample out their liberties by Federal power, they would have been unworthy the name of men if they had not protested in every conceivable and possible form; if they had not been restive and dissatisfied and manifested that dissatisfaction in every possible and proper way.

I do not unite in the cry that these men of Louisiana ought to have tamely surrendered their liberties even at the dictation of the President of the United States. Why, sirs, if they had done so, they would have been far less worthy of freedom than our fathers who, at the command of King George and even at the dictates of the British Parliament, were not willing to be made slaves; and in uttering this sentiment that I am glad they would not tamely consent to be slaves, I but give expression to the noble sentiments of Pitt in the British Parliament, when he declared: "I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest."

This was their condition when the election came off last fall. The people of Louisiana knew full well that a large majority of her suffering citizens were hostile to the Kellogg usurpation, and would vote, if an opportunity was offered, against its continuance over them; but they also knew that the whole machinery of the election was in the hands of Kellogg and his subordinates. They knew it would be impossible to procure a fair election. But there was no other chance to escape from the oppression, and they determined to try the ballot as the only remaining hope for them.

The election came off, was conducted very generally by the minions of Kellogg, and the result was better than the people had anticipated. The opposition to the usurpation elected a very decided majority of the Legislature, about twenty majority according to the count of the votes at the time; but Kellogg had arranged a returning board to suit his purposes. If he failed in the election, he was determined not to fail in counting out his opponents. Every one knows that the returning board manipulated the returns until they were enabled to count in a majority of one for the republican party in the house of representatives by refusing certificates to five democratic members who were elected and whose case they referred to the house after it should be convened.

These were the circumstances which preceded the meeting of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th of January. Let us look at what took place at that organization. We were informed by telegraph, and it is not denied, in fact it is admitted, I believe, in the dispatches of General Sheridan and in the message of the President of the United States, that the military forces of the United States were placed in and around the capitol of the State on the morning of the 4th; that they were placed under the control of Mr. Kellogg as their commander-in-chief; that no man was admitted into the hall of either house, especially of the house of representatives, without the permission of Mr. Kellogg; that the Federal forces were there to enforce his mandates and his decrees. Now what a picture for republican government. The State-house, in which the Legislature was to meet to transact business, prior to the assembling of the Legislature was taken possession of by Federal soldiers so that no man could enter that State-house except by the permission of their superior officer, Major-General Kellogg. These are the facts.

Now I ask Senators to look at that picture in this land which we call a land of liberty. I ask Senators, can any man under any state of circumstances excuse an act like that, where the members of a State Legislature are allowed to enter their halls for the purpose of legislating for the State only by the permission of Federal military power? That was the initiative step toward the organization of the Legislature on the morning of the 4th of January.

Then what occurred? By the very kind consideration of Mr. Kellogg the democratic members were permitted to take seats in the hall of the house of representatives. The hour of twelve o'clock came—the hour for organizing; the clerk of the last house of representatives was present and called the list, and immediately a motion was made by a member-elect of the house that Mr. Wiltz should be temporary chairman, and he put the question, and declared it carried, and Mr. Wiltz took his place as temporary speaker of that house. It is objected and brought in here as a justification, as an excuse, as a palliation for the military interference, that the clerk of the last house did not put the motion. This is a mere quibble. I do not know what has been customary in other States; but I had once the honor of being a member of the Legislature of my own State, and know full well how we organized. We did not even have a clerk to call any roll. The members met in the hall of the house, and some member-elect made a motion that Mr. A B be temporary speaker. The motion was put and carried. Somebody else made a motion that another member act as clerk, and then the names of the members-elect were handed in, and we proceeded to organize the house without the assistance of any officer of the preceding Legislature.

After Mr. Wiltz had become speaker the organization was completed; but before the permanent organization of the house was completed a resolution was passed admitting five gentlemen who were then present, who had been candidates for election, and whose cases had been referred to the house of representatives by the returning board, against whom there was not even a contest, no persons claiming the seats but themselves; and I am justified in saying that by a letter from Hon. Randall Gibson, a member of the next House of Representatives, addressed to Mr. BECK and published in the papers. He says:

> The five members admitted to their seats, after Wiltz had been elected temporary speaker and had sworn in all the members whose names were on the roll furnished by West, had not, it is true, been returned by the returning board, but they had been declared elected by the careful commissioners of election in their parishes. Their right to their seats was not contested. Nobody at any time disputed their right to their seats. The board took no action in the matter. It simply referred these parishes to the house of representatives, not as contested parishes nor disputed parishes. All the board could do under the infamous law creating it was to canvass and compile, to reject or admit certain members. They did not reject these members nor admit them; they declined to act. These five members were therefore in the house, and clearly entitled to their seats, which were not contested. They were not admitted till after all the members on the roll had been sworn in and qualified. Wiltz was elected permanent speaker by fifty-five votes, two having been cast for Hahn, and one blank, making fifty-eight present, or two more than a quorum.

It is objected that these gentlemen were not entitled to seats because they were not on the list, because the returning board had not declared them elected, but had referred the cases of the parishes which they represented to the house of representatives, and the right of these five gentlemen was to be passed upon by the house. In reference to the right of these five members to sit in that house, there was no person claiming their seats. After the temporary organization of the house after the members had been sworn in, these five gentlemen were properly admitted to seats by formal resolution of the house. They were sworn in and became members of the body.

After Mr. Wiltz had been sworn in by the judge, what did he do? He called upon members to stand up and be sworn in; and here let me say that every member of that house, whether democratic or republican stood up and was sworn in as a member. There was no failure to recognize Mr. Wiltz. He was recognized by the republican members of that house as speaker, and they accepted from him the oath of office. There was a perfect recognition of that house as organized by the republican members of the house themselves. They stood up and took the oath of office from Mr. Wiltz as the speaker of that house.

Mr. Wiltz, as speaker of that house, after the organization had been completed, after he had been elected by a quorum of the votes of the entire Legislature, conducted the proceedings of that body for two hours after the meeting, and a part of the republican members were present all the time. It was at the expiration of two hours subsequent to the meeting of the Legislature that the military commander entered that house to interfere with it.

But it is objected that he had been there before; that Mr. Wiltz, the speaker of that house, had called on General De Trobriand to speak to a disorderly crowd in the lobbies; and that is used as an argument to sustain Federal interference with the existence of a State Legislature.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the honorable Senator wants the facts. I desire to introduce a statement made by three members of the House of Representatives on the very point. No republican was sworn in, and no member of the house had been sworn. Here is what they state in their report:

> Mr. Wiltz, as temporary chairman, administered the oath to the members en masse, amid the protest of the republican members.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, if the honorable Senator pleases, on the assumption of the temporary organization by Mr. Wiltz, he administered the oath, which was administered by their rising, to one hundred and two members, as I think. I have the authority of a respectable eye-witness to state that there were three members of the present House of Repsesentatives of the United States from Louisiana, Mr. MOREY and two others, and when Mr. Wiltz called on the members to stand up and be sworn in under the temporary organization, seven or eight of the colored members in the back part of the room did not rise, and that these republican members of the House of Representatives of the United States, being present, went to them and caused them to get up, so that the whole body was sworn in by what is termed their rising.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, I read the testimony of three members of the House of Representatives of the United States who were present.

Mr. BAYARD. I speak of members of the House of Representatives who were present also.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wished to correct the statement of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I see from the preparations of the Senator from Ohio that he proposes to follow me at some time in this debate, and I should prefer, therefore, that any remarks he may have to make on this subject may be deferred until he occupies the floor. But I say to the Senator from Ohio that I will pay some respect and attention to the report of the sub-committee of the House of Representatives before I am through with my remarks, if the time permits.

I have spoken, Mr. President, of the manner in which the State-house was surrounded prior to the meeting of the Legislature, and I want to put in this further remark, that Mr. Kellogg, while he permitted the military force to admit the democratic members of that house to their seats, expected by the show of force, expected by the military array surrounding that house, to intimidate the members. He failed. And it was not until after that failure, after he found that the freemen of Louisiana elected to her Legislature were not to be intimidated by a show of force, by the appearance and glitter of military parade around them, that he came to the determination to order the dispersion of the house, as Cromwell ordered the dispersion of a British Parliament.

The President of the United States says that he knew nothing of this transaction until after it occurred, and I am willing to concede that this is true; but I have before said, by his having disposed of the military forces in a manner in which they might be so used, by his failure to condemn the act after it has been perpetrated, by his quasi indorsement of the act, by the excuse which he makes for it, he is committed to the act, and I think in the judgment of his countrymen he will not escape. If we may believe the telegram of the Secretary of War, it was so indorsed by the President, for he emphatically says "the President and all of us approve." But I am willing to take the statement of the President, that he did not know himself until the morning of the 5th that the act had been done; but he knew that the act was liable to be done, for he had so disposed of the military forces, had so placed them under an irresponsible agent that they might be so used; and the act of his subordinate, Mr. Kellogg, becomes his own act, and for that act he must be held responsible before the country, and for that act his party will be held responsible if they attempt to indorse and approve it.

This act of the military power of the Goverment, no matter by whose order, whether by the President or by General Emory or by Kellogg, we on this side of the Chamber unhesitatingly and most emphatically condemn and denounce. This invasion of the right of a sovereign State to be free from interference in her Legislature the President of the United States does not condemn but excuses and palliates. This attempt to make the military superior to the civil power republican Senators in this debate defend by excuses made for the act; and one Senator yesterday in argument—I refer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]—put in the plea of justification. While other Senators plead in confession and avoidance, the Senator from New Jersey put in the plea of justification.

What, then, is the issue presented? It is nothing less than this: Shall the right of the Legislature of a State of this Union to meet and organize and perform the functions pertaining to the law-making department of the State government be controlled by the military force of the Government of the United States? That is the issue. Those who defend the interference in Louisiana maintain the right of the Federal Army to invade the sanctity of legislative halls, to control their organization, to determine who shall and who shall not be members, and expel and drive out such members as are obnoxious to themselves or those under whose order they may at the time be acting. Never in the history of a free people was a question of more alarming import presented for their consideration. It strikes at the very foundation of liberty and menaces the existence of republican government in this land. In vain has a Constitution been written; in vain have the limitations of Federal power been inserted in that instrument; in vain have our boasts of free institutions, local self-government, State rights, and security as freemen been made, if we are the slaves of power and hold all our rights by the tenure of Executive pleasure; if the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, either by his own order or by a delegation of his authority to another, may use the Army or any part of it to determine who shall constitute the members of a State Legislature.

Think, Senators, of the consequences involved in this issue. Under our system of government, most if not all our laws for the protection of life and property are made by the Legislatures of the States. State laws regulate all the domestic relations; all marital rights; the descent of property; the punishment of crime; in short, the duties, responsibility, and rights of the citizen. They regulate the administration of justice, and measure and distribute the burdens of government among the people. Nearly every right which we enjoy and every duty we are required to perform are determined and regulated by State laws. If the character of the Legislature of a State may be controlled by a military commander or by the President of the United States, or by any other person or number of persons whomsoever not responsible to the State, where is the security against oppression, where is the guarantee of right, the protection against wrong? I repeat, sir, never was so important a question presented to the American people. Involved in this question is the continuance of republican government in this land; involved in this question is the centralization of all power in the hands of the Federal Government; involved in this question is the right of every man to be free; because once concede that the General Government has absolute power and it may put the fetters upon us all; it may trample upon the rights and liberties of every citizen; it may become a depotism of the worst character.

This is a question which addresses itself not exclusively to the people of Louisiana. They are the immediate sufferers by this act; they perhaps feel it more keenly than any of the rest of us, because they are the eye-witnesses of the destruction of their liberties. But it is a question for the people of this whole country; it becomes an American question, a question that addresses all of us, the people of every State in this Union. Mr. Evarts said in his speech at the Cooper Institute the other evening:

> Well, now, I don't exactly like the form of argument addressed to citizens of the United States—as we all are—that we must not be unconcerned or careless about this action in Louisiana, for it may be repeated in New York. [Cries of "Never!" "Never!"] I don't like that form of argument to citizens. I tell you, fellow-citizens of the United States, that when it is done in one State it is done in all. [Applause.] The United States, it is our boast, in its frame of government, is vital in every part, and cannot be hurt in one part without injury to all.

That is not the language of a partisan. Mr. Evarts is a republican; he has sustained this Administration, I think, in acts that it ought not to have been sustained in; but when the great issue is presented to his broad mind, rising above the feeling of the partisan he gives expression to the patriotism that wells up in his heart; he looks to his country, its future destiny and the future happiness of its citizens, and he says in emphatic words that this is a question that is addressed to us all. I wish his example had imitators all over this country. I am inclined to believe that there are men everywhere in this land who will respond to the noble sentiment which I have read; but I regret exceedingly that that sentiment finds not a proper response on the other side of this Chamber.

Now, sir, what is our form of government? I heard yesterday from the Senator from New Jersey that we were a nation. I have no objection to the use of that term in a proper acceptation of it, but if by that term is meant to convey the idea that this is a government where all power is centralized in Washington, in the Congress of the United States and in the President of the United States and in the Supreme Court of the United States, then I repudiate the term. Our form of government is a federal form of government, dual in its character. We have a General Government of limited and delegated and enumerated powers. Every power which can be rightfully exercised by the General Government or any department of the General Government is enumerated in the Constitution of the country. Whenever it steps outside of that instrument, whenever it attempts to carry out or exercise any power which is not expressly delegated in the Constitution or such as is necessary to carry into effect the granted powers, it becomes a trespasser upon the rights of the States and upon the rights of the people.

Our fathers, when they made this Government, were jealous of central power. They had fought the battles of the Revolution against central power; they had won the freedom which we have inherited and heretofore enjoyed because of their resistance to the exercise of central power; and when they came to frame the Constitution, the States of this Union that were represented in the convention were careful to limit the powers which could be exercised by the General Government. They were not willing to trust even to the forms of constitution which obtained in some of the old countries, but they insisted on a written constitution, where every power which was granted should be expressed. When they consented to the formation of the Union, they gave to the General Government all the power that was necessary to carry out the objects for which it was created; but they put it in the written bond itself that they reserved to the States and the people every right that was not conceded to the General Government and not inhibited to the States, so that the residuum of power withheld from the Central Government belongs to the people of this country and to the States of this Union.

Therefore, when I heard yesterday from the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that we are a nation—meaning, as I thought at the time, to convey the impression that as a government we might exercise almost unlimited power, I was alarmed at the sentiment that this Government was to become a centralized despotism, that the States of this Union were to be depleted of the rights which they had heretofore enjoyed, and that American citizens were to hold their rights and their liberties at congressional and executive pleasure.

Mr. President, under the form of government which our fathers created for us we have been a free and a happy people. Our Government is not yet one hundred years old; yet we have grown up from three millions of people to a population of over forty millions; the territory which was formed into States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, lying as a little strip of land along the Atlantic coast, has extended its borders until it sweeps over distant hills, over prairies and mountains, and stretches to the far-off Pacific. Our land has until recently been the abode of a free and contented people, and such a bright example of prosperity, that multitudes from the old countries have come to our shores to share the blessings of liberty which we enjoy. Such has been our condition. We have been a free people; we have been a happy and contented people; and now, I ask, are we to give up this freedom, this happiness, this contentment that we have heretofore enjoyed? Are we to consent that our State governments shall be blotted out, that their powers shall be curtailed, that the rights of the States and the rights of the citizens shall be held exclusively at the pleasure of the President of the United States, or of Congress, or of the General Government in all its departments combined? or are we to look for protection to life and liberty to home laws under State institutions? Are we hereafter to depend not upon our own Legislatures but upon the laws that may be enacted in this Hall? If a President of the United States or the military power of the Government of the United States, whether at the dictation of the President as Commander-in-Chief or any subordinate of his, may enter the halls of the Legislature of a State and disperse at the point of the bayonet the men who constitute that Legislature, tell me not that you enjoy the rights of freemen. It is mockery and madness to suppose so. If that is to be the rule, why mock the people of this country with the form of home government? If that home government is to be controlled in all its branches by the Federal power, it is a sham, a delusion, and a cheat to hold out to the people the idea that they have home rule, that they have State governments, if those governments are to be controlled exclusively by military power at the dictation of the President of the United States or of anybody else.

I repudiate the idea that the rights of the States of this Union as they have heretofore existed cannot coexist with the rights of the General Government. There is no necessity for conflict between State rights and the proper exercise of the powers granted to the General Government. Each of them, if kept within its proper sphere—if the Federal Government is confined and restrained in its actions to the powers granted by the Constitution and exercises and attempts to exercise no other, there will be no conflict between State rights and the Federal power, but each of them will move on in its own proper orbit orderly and in harmony like the planets in the heavens. There will be no conflict, there will be no discord, but there will be perfect agreement, and the happiness that we have heretofore enjoyed will be continued and perpetuated and handed down to the latest ages of posterity. But, sir, there have always been in this country men who were in favor of what they called a strong central government. At the time the Constitution was formed there were honest men, patriots, noble men, who thought we ought to have a strong government. They had not tested the experiment of republican government with restricted federal authority. They had not tried it. They were fearful it would not work, and they honestly thought it was necessary to confer greater powers on the General Government in the formation of the Federal Constitution. They had seen the weakness of the Confederacy under the Articles of Confederation, and they thought it was necessary to confer upon the General Government greater powers than were contained in the Constitution. They were honest men, noble, high-minded, patriotic, able men as the country ever produced. But because there were men in that convention who had never tried the experiment of republican government, and who thought without the experience we have that it was necessary to confer on the Government greater powers than were contained in the Constitution, furnishes no argument for those who now seek to strengthen the General Government at the expense of the States.

After the men who were opposed to a strong Government had shaped the Constitution in the form in which they handed it down to us, this desire for a strong government still existed, and the men who entertained that desire sought to obtain by a construction of the provisions of the Constitution that which had failed to be incorporated in its provisions by the convention. But happily for the country a Marshall sat on the supreme bench. He had grown up with the Constitution. He had lived at the very time of its formation. He had taken counsel with the members of that convention and imbibed their spirit. He knew their purpose; he knew their intent and object; and he stood up in the interpretation of the Constitution for the purposes it contemplated, and gave to it such construction as was intended by the framers of the instrument. Sir, he was a great man, a great jurist, and especially upon what was intended to be embodied in the Constitution no man at his day or since, in my judgment, has understood the question as thoroughly as Marshall.

Thus we have been saved until the present time from central power. There have been inroads upon the rights of the States; there have been impingements upon the right of the citizen; but the broad question is now presented in a more alarming aspect than it was ever presented before. The question now is whether the General Government shall have the power to control the Legislatures of the States, to enter their halls and displace members elected to those bodies. That is the question now presented. It is a question of power sought to be exercised by the General Government, which will subvert our republican institutions if the people of this country do not condemn and oppose it.

But, Mr. President, I will pass on now to notice the excuses which have been made by our friends on the other side in this debate for this military usurpation. There has been, I believe, but one gentleman who has put in the plea of justification; but every Senator on the other side who has spoken has sought to excuse these acts and to draw off public attention from the enormity of the crime that has been perpetrated against public liberty by interposing excuses for the acts of the military commanders and for Mr. Kellogg and for the President. I propose to notice some of the excuses which have been made.

One excuse is the irregularity of the organization of the Louisiana Legislature. It is said that the organization was irregular, because the clerk of the last house did not organize the new house; that he did not submit and determine the vote upon every motion made during the organization; that he was not only the secretary to call the roll, but the president of the house to put the questions. Is not that puerile? Is not that one of the flimsiest pretexts ever offered in justification of a wrong? How could any lawyer go before a jury in a criminal prosecution and attempt to obtain a verdict of acquittal for his client by putting in a plea of so flimsy a character as that? No lawyer would undertake it.

But now, how inconsistent our republican friends are in these positions! They insist that it was absolutely necessary that the names should be on the list furnished by the secretary of state, and they insist that there was a statutory provision that the clerk of the last house should continue in office and call the roll, and, mark you, that provision, as I am informed, but I have not had time to look over the law of Louisiana, goes no further; it does not provide that he shall do anything more than call the list; it does not authorize him to preside at the organization or do any other act than call the list, as I am informed. I say how inconsistent are our republican friends, for this is not a novel question in this Senate. It has been here before. This provision in the law of Louisiana continuing the clerk of the last house in office is not a constitutional provision. If I am informed aright, it is but a statutory provision; it is a mere declaration on the part of a preceding Legislature that such shall be the case. A statute of the State of Louisiana simply continues the clerk, with power to call the roll furnished him by the secretary of state. There his duty ends; and I say that it was perfectly competent in Mr. Billieu to make the motion that Mr. Wiltz be speaker, and to put that question to the house himself. There was nothing in the statutes of the State to prohibit it; and yet our republican friends insist that there was irregularity in the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana sufficient to excuse military interference, because, forsooth, the clerk, after calling the list of members, did not put the question on Mr. Billieu's motion and decide himself whether it was carried or not.

Now, let us see the position of our friends on a former occasion. I repeat, this question is not a novel one here. It has been here before, and every member of the Senate has voted upon it. I refer now to the case from Alabama of Sykes vs. Spencer. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] will pardon me for alluding to a case in which he was personally interested. I do so because it will illustrate the inconsistency of republican Senators, and show what they thought of such a question only a short time ago.

In the State of Alabama the constitution provides that the lieutenant-governor shall preside in the organization of the senate; it provides that the speaker of the last house shall remain in office until his successor is elected and qualified. These are not mere statutory provisions, but constitutional provisions which a Legislature could not disregard with impunity. The provision of the Alabama constitution is:

> SEC. 6. The house of representatives, when assembled, shall choose a speaker and its other officers; and the senate shall choose a president, in the absence of the lieutenant-governor, and its other officers; each house shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members, but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law. The president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives shall remain in office until their successors are elected and qualified.

That is the sixth section of article 4 of the constitution of Alabama. Now let us look at the facts. The facts are not disputed that in the Legislature which elected Mr. SPENCER, who was awarded a seat in this body at the last session of the Senate after a contest, the senate and the house of representatives did not meet at the place where the Legislature usually meets, at the State-house, provided by law; the lieutenant-governor did not preside in the organization of that senate; the speaker of the last house of representatives did not preside over the organization of the house of representatives that elected Mr. SPENCER; but these officers presided over the organization of another Legislature which meet at the State-house in Montgomery, composed of a majority of members in each house, having the certificates of election from the secretary of state, and which Legislature elected Mr. Sykes as a Senator from that State. When we urged these matters against the admission of Mr. SPENCER to a seat in this body that the legislative bodies who elected him were not legally constituted under the provisions of the constitution of Alabama, how were we met? That these were mere questions of form; that it made no difference if the Legislature that elected Mr. SPENCER, instead of going to the capital of the State, went to the United States court-room; that it made no difference if the lieutenant-governor was not present and did not help organize the senate of that State; that it made no difference if the speaker of the last house of representatives was not present. It was contended by our friends on the other side that these were all matters of form and not matters of substance. So they seated Mr. SPENCER against Mr. Sykes, who had been elected by a Legislature which had complied with every requirement of the constitution in the organization of the legislative bodies that elected him.

The positions of Senators sometimes come home to plague them. How are they going out before the country now to justify the military invasion of the rights of Louisiana and the dispersion of the Legislature? Can they justify it upon the bare, bald plea that the organization was irregular, because, forsooth, the clerk of the last house of representatives did not put the question when the motion was made to elect a speaker? How can they justify that invasion of the rights of a soverign State when they are confronted with their own acts in admitting to a seat on this floor a gentleman who was elected by a Legislature that met and organized in contravention of constitutional provision? So far as the Legislature of Louisiana is concerned, there is no constitutional provision in reference to the organization of the houses, except that it confers upon each house the right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualification of its members. It is a mere statutory provision in Louisiana; whereas in Alabama I repeat, it was a constitutional provision, which in the contested case to which I have referred was considered as a mere matter of form, wholly disregarded, and treated as a nullity.

But, Mr. President, suppose there was any irregularity in the organization of the house of representatives of Louisiana, I submit to the Senate is that a justification for the interference of the military power of the United States? What business has the United States to interfere with the organization of a house, whether it be regular or irregular? What right has the General Government to become the arbitrator in a question of that kind and to disperse a State Legislature, to determine its existence, simply because there may have been irregularities in the organization of the house? It is trifling with this grave subject to interpose such quibbles.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. Suppose it were an ascertained fact that domestic violence or insurrection had intrenched itself in one house of a Legislature, is there any sacredness in a State capitol or in the room where that assembly meets, where an illegal assembly is intrenching itself, that puts it beyond that provision of the Constitution of the United States which requires the General Government to protect a State against domestic violence?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If there is domestic violence anywhere which the State authorities are impotent to overcome, and if the Legislature be in session and calls upon the President under section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution, he has a right then to interpose, or in the absence of the legislative department of the government and it cannot be convened, if there is domestic violence in the State such as the State authorities cannot control, then the governor may call on the President, who may then interfere. I admit that is in the Constitution. I would be glad if my friends on the other side of this question would look carefully to the Constitution for its limitations upon Federal power as well as for modes by which to evade those limitations. Was there any such domestic violence on the 4th of January in the house as to warrant an interference of the military power? Is it sought to be placed on that ground? What says General Sheridan in his dispatch? That the Legislature peacefully assembled. I have not time to refer to his dispatches; they are contained here in the papers accompanying the President's message. There is no pretense that there was such domestic violence as is contemplated in the Constitution for an interference by the General Government. On the contrary, the only manifestation of turbulence at all was in the galleries, and a simple word hushed them into silence. Was that a state of insurrection, of domestic violence?

Mr. SARGENT. A word of whom?

Mr. SAULSBURY. A word of General De Trobriand.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not like to interrupt my friend, but I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks that the word that was spoken by General De Trobriand was asked for simply because he was standing there a single individual, or because his word was enforced by the whole Army and Navy and the constitutional power of the United States in the view of those who invoked him?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to my honorable friend that I am not a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart of any man. I cannot tell what the motive was. It might have been respect for a military commander; it might have been because they were fearful that the military power of this Government, as they had seen and felt its oppressions before, might be brought in upon them; but the fact is that a simple word of General De Trobriand did produce quiet in the lobbies. And yet we are asked to believe that there was domestic violence which justified Federal intervention!

What will the people of this country say when the Senator from California goes out to justify this military invasion of a sovereign State upon the plea of domestic violence, and when he gets up and tells them there was trouble in the gallery, and that a single word of a military chieftain hushed them into silence? The people of this great country will laugh at such an argument. I am sure it will never have the effect that it may be designed to have. I repeat again, if there were irregularities in the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana, what right had the General Government to interfere? What right had General De Trobriand to march in a file of soldiers and with fixed bayonets drive from that Legislature the five men who were there as members of that Legislature, who had been sworn in as members of that Legislature, and who, by the admission of all parties, were rightful claimants to seats in that body? I want this question to be understood, and I think the people of this country will understand it, and that no sophistry, no evasion of the real question, will divert the public mind from the real issue involved in this case. That is one of the instances where there was irregularity in the organization of the Legislature. But then, says another Senator in excuse, in palliation, or in justification of this act, there was an attempt to overthrow the Kellogg government. Upon what is that based? The members of the Louisiana Legislature met peacefully and quietly, according to General Sheridan. They had a right to meet; nobody questions that. How do Senators find out that they were going to overthrow the Kellogg government? There is no question that Kellogg knew his acts had been acts of usurpation; he knew that he deserved impeachment if there was a democratic Legislature to do it. He feared that such might be the case, and there is the secret of the whole concern. If there had been no apprehension on the part of the President of the United States that his pet governor would be turned out; if there had been no apprehension on the part of Mr. Kellogg that he would be impeached and put out of his office, then there would have been no military intervention in all probability. It is said that it was in contemplation to overthrow the Kellogg government when there had not been an attempt on the part of this Legislature to do any unlawful act. They were peacefully assembled, says General Sheridan. But, say Senators, they intended to overthrow the Kellogg government; and that is their excuse for this military interference. If the governor was liable to impeachment, is there any objection to that? Did not you as a Senate try the President of the United States a few years ago on articles of impeachment regularly preferred? Is it not one of the functions of a legislative body to prefer articles of impeachment against public officers high or low, and if found guilty to turn them out? Suppose then their object was to impeach and turn Kellogg out, does that excuse this military interference? But, says another Senator, they intended to do it by violence. Where is the proof of that? There is no proof whatever. There is no evidence before us even that Kellogg would have been impeached. But I express it as my opinion that he ought to be impeached if there was a Legislature to do it, and I have no doubt the gentlemen who constituted the Legislature of Louisiana and were driven from the hall of the house had the nerve to do their duty. For that reason I suppose, if they had had the requisite majority in the Legislature, knowing all the great crimes of William Pitt Kellogg, they would have impeached him and turned him out of office; but there is not a particle of evidence that they intended to turn him out by revolutionary means—by violence, by force. Gentlemen draw on their imaginations. Because there had been an overthrow of this government on the 14th of September, they infer from that that it was the intention of this Legislature to use violence against Kellogg.

I do not desire to take up too much of the time of the Senate, but I desire to say in reference to the President of the United States that I am pleased with the tone of his message. While I believe the President of the United States, by not rebuking this act of usurpation of the military power, by placing the military power of the country in the hands and under the control of William Pitt Kellogg, and by the quasi approval and indorsement which he gives to it in refusing to denounce it in fitting terms, and by his failure to punish the men who did it and to remove them from that field, is indirectly responsible, yet I am willing to accept the President's message as a disclaimer of any knowledge that this thing was to be done. I believe the President stated what is true, that he had no knowledge of what was done before the morning of the 5th instant, and I admit that he should not be held responsible for a direct order commanding this thing to be done, but is simply responsible for making it possible and likely to take place by placing the soldiers under Kellogg without proper orders to prevent it. But I say very frankly I am pleased with the tone of the President's message. I am pleased with it because it is free from a defiant spirit to the Senate and the country. The President has heard the murmurings of discontent, and apparently yields to the protests of his countrymen. We had been given to understand that he was to assume the responsibility. The telegram of the Secretary of War to General Sheridan said that "the President and all of us approve your acts," and Sheridan assumed the responsibility for the action of the military authorities at New Orleans. We had been given to understand by rumor that there was a defiant tone in the President's message, and I am glad that when it came here it came in a respectful tone, becoming the President of the United States. Sir, he had heard the murmurs of discontent in this land, and I am glad the "man of iron," as he is sometimes called, quailed before the gathering storm. I am willing to do justice to the President; I am not disposed to do him injustice. I know not what are the reasons of the subdued tone of his message; I do not know whether the rumor that it was modified to prevent a breach in the Cabinet is true or not; but I am willing to say, to the honor of the President, that he spoke in his message in proper and respectful terms, and in a proper and respectful spirit, such as becomes the leader of a great people.

But I have a right to deal with the facts which the President brings before the country as an excuse and justification of the Kellogg usurpation and the military interference which have taken place in New Orleans. He brings before us the fact of the installation of Kellogg and the hostility to his government, and we have a right to deal with that question. Let us look at that matter for a moment. How was Kellogg installed? It is as familiar to the Senate as household words. We have had a committee, the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who have dealt with that question, and I have here the report before me. I know what that committee says; every Senator here knows what it says. The committee said emphatically that Kellogg was not elected. Even the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in his minority report as chairman of that committee, did not claim that Kellogg had been elected. The Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the Senator from Rhode Island, now in his seat, [Mr. ANTHONY,] and other Senators on that committee expressly declared in their report that Kellogg was not elected. I need not read it. I will, however, read a paragraph:

> Your committee are, therefore, led to the conclusion that if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the Legislature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State. Considering all the facts established before your committee, there seems no escape from the alternative that the McEnery government must be recognized by Congress, or Congress must provide for a re-election.

That committee was emphatic that it would never do to continue this man Kellogg, who had been installed in office under the decree of a Federal judge by Federal bayonets, for he was not elected. The returns before them demonstrated that fact, and that committee, though every man of them a republican, spoke out as honest men and said that this man Kellogg had not been elected and that the party acting with him was not elected. That is the fact. Now, how did he get into office? He was not elected to the office. Then how did he get there? Judge Durell, at the hour of midnight, in his own chamber, without a case before him, entered a bald decree, directing the marshal to take possession of the capitol of the State, and Federal bayonets enforced the decree. That is how Mr. Kellogg became Governor; that is how he became, I had liked to have said, the tyrant over Louisiana. How came this decree to be enforced by bayonets? That decree was made on the night of the 5th of December, 1872. How came the Federal forces there to enforce his decree? Telegrams from Attorney-General Williams had directed on the 3d of December that the mandates of the Federal court should be enforced. I am not here to charge the President of the United States with any complicity with Durell or that the Attorney-General was in complicity with Durell, but I do say that it is a very striking fact that on the 3d a telegram was sent to the military authorities to enforce the decrees of the Federal court and on the 6th a decree was enforced at the hour of two o'clock in the morning by Federal bayonets which took possession of the State-house in Louisiana and installed Kellogg and his government, excluding the legally-elected Legislature of the State. These are facts drawn from the report of the committee itself. I need not read them in detail.

I desire, however, Mr. President, to call your attention to another fact. The President of the United States portrays the deplorable condition of Louisiana, the restiveness of the people of Louisiana, the dissatisfaction at the Kellogg government. He tells you of the horrible condition of things which rumor says exists there, for the President cannot have any more information about it personally than I have. He derives his information from reports made to him, and the world is filled with reports. He tells you from these rumors or these reports that are made to him and the Department of Justice that there is bloodshed, murder, violence, and intimidation in that State, that the people are turbulent and restive. The Senator from Louisiana the other day depicted in glowing terms the material disadvantages of the people; that they were poor; that their levees were broken down; that commerce had fled from the wharves and streets of the cities of Louisiana, and he even intimated that the Treasury of the United States would have to be opened to feed, year after year, the people of that State under this régime of Kellogg. That is the beautiful picture that is exhibited both by the President and the Senator from Louisiana. Why, let me ask, does that state of things exist? That was not the state of things a few years ago, even under the corrupt administration of Warmoth there. I remember well after Senator Blair had arraigned Governor Warmoth, the Senator from Louisiana came in next morning with a written speech, a eulogy upon that man, and said that he had brought order out of chaos and that tranquillity and peace and prosperity were the result of his administration; and he paid a glowing tribute to the administrative abilities of Governor Warmoth.

And yet in two short years the Senator from Louisiana tells us that his people are poor, that their taxes are heavy, that they are unable to pay them, that their levees are going down, and that they will have to be fed out of the public Treasury. Why is this? Why this discontent, this restiveness, this poverty, this wretchedness in Louisiana? I will tell you, sir. You forced over the people of that State a government not of their choice. You forced over the people of Louisiana a usurping government that is eating out their substance, depriving them of their liberties, and they are restive, and I am glad they are restive and dissatisfied. I should be sorry to see the day come when the people of any State in this Union would tamely submit to be ruled by a government not of their choice but a government placed over them by the decrees of a Federal judge enforced by Federal bayonets. I do not want my republican friends to suppose that I am in favor of bloodshed and riot and murder, and all that. I am a man of peace; my conscience as well as my hands are unstained by human gore; but I want to see the freemen of this country restive and demanding their just rights, and I want to see in the White House and in the Senate of the United States a respect for their just rights and a disposition to restore them to the liberties of which they have been robbed.

Senators, this dissatisfaction on the part of the people of Louisiana would not have been the case if you had not displaced Mr. McEnery, the lawfully elected governor of Louisiana, and the Legislature elected with him; if you had not driven them out, denied them admission to the capitol of their own State, but permitted the government of their choice to be established over the people of Louisiana. I do not draw on fancy for that sketch; I look at what is said by your own committee:

> It is the opinion of your committee, that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board, and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people—

Ah, sir, there would have been none of this restiveness, none of this dissatisfaction, according to the judgment of a republican committee of this Senate, composed of able lawyers, if the McEnery government had been permitted to go into operation; it would have been acquiesced in. Why? Because the conviction would have rested upon the minds of the people of Louisiana that that was the rightful government; and they would submit to-day, as the people of this country will always submit, to a government of their own choice; but they have not tamely submitted to Kellogg, and they ought never to submit tamely to a government which is not of their own choice.

But this is not all. Mark what the committee say further:

> And that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State.

That is what the committee of this body say, that the McEnery government would have been acquiesced in by the people and would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State.

But, say Senators on the other side, and it is repeated in the message of the President of the United States, but for fraud Kellogg would have been elected. They do not say he was elected, but that except for frauds committed he would have been. That is mere opinion, and I oppose to that position the opinion of Judge Trumbull, who made a report as a member of your committee. He said there were no such frauds as had been alleged and that there had been no such frauds as could invalidate and render void an election. But I have not time to cite his report; I only refer to it. But I ask, suppose there were frauds in a State election, what right had the Federal Government to interpose? Suppose there had been frauds in the State of Maryland, what right would the President of the United States, with the military power of the United States, or Congress, or any other Department of the Government of the United States have to interpose to settle the question of fraud in the State of Maryland or the State of Louisiana or any other State? None whatsoever.

How do they arrive at this question of fraud? The committee say they believed it. How did they arrive at it? Because it was generally conceded, as the report says, that Warmoth's defection from the republican party, from the support of General Grant, and his adhesion to Mr. Greeley amounted to twenty thousand votes. Why? Warmoth had been their governor, they knew his political machinations as a republican, and they inferred that he would play the same game against them that he had played for them; but there is no proof except some vague rumors and manufactured affidavits. There was no legal proof which the committee could get hold of. I have no doubt the committee believed what they said, that there were frauds; but I repeat, if there were frauds it was not a question for Congress or a question for the President or even for a Federal court to interfere with. It was a question belonging exclusively to the State.

But in this report it is admitted that Kellogg's government was set up by Federal interference. That is admitted. It has been kept in existence since by Federal interference. Those facts are admitted in this report. They are impliedly admitted in the President's message. I want to direct attention to the Durell order, which was the basis of the Kellogg government. The committee say that it was indefensible in every point of view. I will not now read the strong, emphatic language of the committee, but I will read the language of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] on that point, for he too, I am glad to say, condemned the action of Judge Durell. Said that Senator:

> The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. The only authority he had in the matter grew out of the act of Congress of 1870 to enforce the fifteenth amendment, and the act amendatory of that passed in 1871, which gave to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under the former act.

There is the condemnation of the Senator from Indiana, and I apprehend that there is not a republican Senator on this floor who will undertake to defend the order or action of Judge Durell. The fact is the country has condemned it; the republican party has condemned it. For fear of impeachment in the house of his friends, he has resigned his commission and taken shelter in obscurity. The whole country condemns the action of Judge Durell, and I have no doubt it is condemned by his whole party. Now, I ask, how can the President of the United States be excused in maintaining a usurpation set up by Durell's order while you condemn Durell and condemn the order?

Mr. President, I do not desire to trespass much longer on the attention of the Senate, and I therefore shall pass several topics upon which I had proposed to speak to the Senate; but there are some other matters to which I must refer.

Another excuse assigned in justification of the military interference or as an excuse therefor is an alleged purpose to overthrow the republican party in the South by bloodshed and murder and intimidation. That has been the refrain from the other side of this Chamber in this whole debate, that there was violence, murder, intimidation throughout the Southern States and particularly in Louisiana, the purpose of which has been to get control of those States and prevent them voting for a republican candidate in 1876. It has been alleged in debate that there was such a purpose existing in those States, to justify or to excuse or palliate this invasion of the sovereign rights of a State. Military dispersion of a State Legislature is justified or excused on the assumed ground that a purpose exists somewhere among white-leaguers or somebody else, by intimidation, by murder, by bloodshed, to carry out the object of overthrowing the republican party in those States. Sir, that has been the burden of the speeches made on the other side of this Chamber. I find in the RECORD of this morning a speech which occupied nearly two days in delivery, and for the first time in the history of the Government I find a cartoon displayed in the public record of the debates of this body, a bloody-head and rawbones cartoon. For the first time, I am told, in the history of this Government has that taken place. Now, we had better send for a Matt Morgan or a Nast. If we must have cartoons in the record of the debates of Congress, let us have them by master hands. I refer to it now to show the burden of the speeches which have been made by gentlemen of the republican party. They are filled with cries of bloodshed, and murder, and intimidation, and assassination, the object being, I suppose, to perpetuate their power by drawing upon the fears of the people of this country. It will not have that effect, nor will this display of the rawhead and bloody-bones in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the speech of the Senator from Illinois, have the effect to alarm the people of this country and prevent them from voting the democratic ticket.

I do not now refer to the speech of the Senator from Illinois for the purpose of attempting to answer his arguments. The arguments of that Senator could have been answered in a very few words. The speech is not an argument, it is rough denunciation of the democratic party, nothing else, the exhibition of rawheads and bloody-bones; and that emblem is a fitting motto for the speech in which it is incorporated. I would say if the speeches which we have heard from the republican side of the Senate during this debate are the type of the speeches that are to be rung out in the next presidential campaign, the party to which the Senator from Illinois belongs will deserve the name of "the party of rawhead and bloody-bones." I have no doubt that the Senator from Illinois, in his canvass last fall through the State of Illinois, did dwell upon these topics, and that his speech here is a résumé and rehash of the arguments which he made before the people of his State. Such arguments did not have a very potent influence there, as appears from the returns of the election in that State. Republican Senators raise the cry that there is to be bloodshed, there is to be murder by White Leagues or somebody else, that makes it necessary for the Federal forces to interfere with and overthrow the existence of a State Legislature. The conclusion to be drawn from the arguments which have been addressed to this subject by the republican side of this Chamber is that this plea is to be put in to excuse military interference and to be the character of their speeches in the next presidential canvass.

I am fearful that there is another meaning to this cry of bloodshed and murder; that it is not simply to be confined to carrying an election. I have heard it rumored—I will not say it is true—that a design exists of remanding certain States of this Union back to the condition in which they were before they were restored to representation in these Halls, and that this cry of murder and of bloodshed, this exhibition of rawheads and bloody-bones, is to prepare the public mind of this country for taking military possession of Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and other States—how far it extends rumor does not say—and remitting these States back, in order that they may not cast their votes in the next presidential election against the republican party. I do not say that this is the object of this cry of blood and murder in this Chamber, but common rumor has given out that such things were in contemplation; and, if so, it is a natural inference that one of the objects proposed in this discussion of this grave question, by appeals to the fears of the timid, is to prepare the public mind for acquiescence in the proposed design. And there are significant facts to which I wish to draw the attention of the Senate in the instructions to General Sheridan. I will now read the dispatch which directed him to go into the Southern States on a tour of observation. There are some very significant expressions in that dispatch of Secretary Belknap, by direction of the President of the United States, to General Sheridan. Here is the dispatch:

[Confidential.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 2, 1874.

GENERAL: The President sent for me this morning, and desires me to say to you that he wishes you to visit the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and especially New Orleans, in Louisiana, and Vicksburgh and Jackson, in Mississippi, and ascertain for yourself, and for his information, the general condition of matters in those localities. You need not confine your visit to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and may extend your trip to other States—Alabama, &c.—if you see proper; nor need you confine your visit in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to the places named. What the President desires is to ascertain the true condition of affairs, and to receive such suggestions from you as you may deem advisable and judicious.

Inclosed herewith is an order authorizing you to assume command of the Military Division of the South, or of any portion of that division, should you see proper to do so. It may be possible that circumstances may arise which would render this a proper course to pursue. You can, if you desire it, see General McDowell in Louisville, and make known to him confidentially the object of your trip; but this is not required of you. Communication with him by you is left entirely to your own judgment.

Of course you can take with you such gentlemen of your staff as you wish, and it is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business, for the fact of your mere presence in the localities referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect.

The President thinks, and so do I, that a trip South might be agreeable to you, and that you might be able to obtain a good deal of information on the subject about which we desire to learn. You can make your return by Washington and make a verbal report, and also inform me from time to time of your views and conclusions.

Yours, truly, &c.,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Chicago, Illinois.

There are some significant expressions in that dispatch. Where was General Sheridan? He was up North; I believe at Chicago. Why select General Sheridan? Why pass by General McDowell, already commander of that department? Why not communicate with General Sherman in reference to this matter? I think the telegram of General Sherman, subsequent to this order, shows that he was not consulted, and had no connection with the sending Sheridan South. Why should General Sheridan be sent to Louisiana, to Mississippi, to Alabama, and to other Southern States? I speak of these facts in connection with this rumor of a contemplated movement to take military possession of those States to prevent their voting the democratic ticket in 1876. I do not assert that that is true; I only assert that common rumor says that; and when I think of the rumors I find in this dispatch and in the subsequent action of General Sheridan, what would seem to sustain the suspicion that there was a purpose to be accomplished.

But, Mr. President, an excuse has been made for this wrong to the people of Louisiana that the South has been rebellious in spirit; that the South has not been quiet. There never was a more patient, suffering community in the world. They have been oppressed as no people ought to have been oppressed, and they have submitted as no people ought to have been compelled to submit to hardships that ought not to have been placed upon them. I think they have been exceedingly patient—entirely too patient under all the oppressions that have been heaped upon them.

I do not propose to discuss this question longer. If I could say a word to my republican friends on the other side that would induce them to unite with us in opposing this measure of usurpation in Louisiana and in bringing back the Administration to what it ought to be—one respecting the just rights of the States of the Union—I would say to them to go to their President. They have influence with him; they bask in his smiles; they enjoy his confidence. Go to the President and tell him to pause; tell him not to trench upon the reserved rights of the States or upon the liberties of the people; tell him to banish all idea of a re-election; to dream not of an empire founded upon the ruins of a republic. Hold up before him the Constitution of his country, and bid him read that all the powers not delegated to the General Government, and not prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States and to the people. If Senators will do this, and can induce the President and his party to pause in their assaults upon the rights of the States and the liberties of the citizen, this Republic may still live and prosper, republican institutions may yet continue in this country, and from foreign climes may continue to come to our shores the oppressed and down-trodden of other lands. Even our broad expanse of public domain may, in the ages to come, be filled with the homes of a people happy and contented, and from hill-top and vale, from prairie and mountain-side, may go up the pæans of gladness, the songs of a free, prosperous, and happy people. But if the strides of Federal power are not staid, if the Constitution of the country is disregarded, then the rights of the States will ultimately be absorbed by the General Government, which will end in central despotism, and the path from the republic to an empire will be strewn with the wrecks of human hopes, and the last expectation, perhaps the last desire of the world for republican institutions, will have disappeared.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I am glad that the attention of this Senate, and more especially of the people of this country, is at last being directed to the investigation and consideration of the deplorable and disgraceful condition of affairs existing in some of the States of this Union. While I had thought that such bloody events as those which transpired at Colfax, at Coushatta, and at New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana; at Trenton, in the State of Tennessee; and at Vicksburgh, in the State of Mississippi, ought to have called public attention to this question sooner, yet I am glad that at last that attention has been arrested.

And I am glad, too, that the event which seems more than all others combined to have arrested this public attention was one which was not marked with bloodshed, but one which grew out as I believe of a sincere desire on the part of the officers of this country to maintain the public peace. I hope that the attention of the Congress of the United States, at the expense of all other business, will continue to be directed to the investigation of this question until the facts are gathered from all the dark places of the South and held up to the public gaze.

I hope that the people of this country, the whole people, will make one earnest, persistent, unremitting effort to bring to light the naked truth which now lies covered up in the South, and almost smothered by all the devices which human ingenuity in the interest of crime can heap upon it. I hope the people will get at the facts, then calmly deliberate on the situation before they render a verdict which must, for good or evil, so vitally affect the welfare of this country.

That there is wide-spread disorder and violence in the South, I think few will deny. That law and order ought to reign supreme where disorder and violence now usurp control, I think every fair-minded man will admit. No matter how much we may disagree as to the doings and sayings of our Chief Magistrate, to one expression I think we can all say "Amen," and that is, "Let us have peace." Unfortunately, even here in this Chamber we cannot agree as to what constitutes peace; how it should be brought about and maintained.

Our democratic friends say that where they have the power in the South peace already exists. While I shall take occasion to controvert that proposition, I say that if that be peace indeed, then I can see how it may be secured there. Let the republican party of the South disband its organization and surrender unconditionally into the hands of the democracy the exercise of all political power; let the republican leaders, especially those who were born in the North, get beyond Mason and Dixon's line at whatever sacrifice, or put padlocks upon their mouths and smother in their bosoms those sentiments for which so many of them fought and so many others bled; let the colored citizen of the South remain in the fields and workshop upon election day and leave our democratic friends the privilege of representing him, not a three-fifth representation but a full representation; let none but white men sit in the jury-boxes, and none but white children have the advantage of the public schools—let these things be done and some others that I might name, and then you would have in the South what our democratic friends here would term "profound peace!" But in my opinion it would not be that peace which the Scripture tells us "passeth all understanding," but rather akin to that which reigns in a man's house at night, when he awakes to find the burglar's pistol at his head and the injunction in his ears to remain perfectly quiet and not disturb himself. In that case there would be no noise, no confusion; the neighbors would not be disturbed, no one would be hurt, perhaps, though a little transfer of property might take place. It would be that kind of peace which existed in the South before a majority of the people of this Union in the manner laid down by law and the Constitution deposited in the ballot-boxes their votes for Abraham Lincoln and not for John C. Breckinridge. Louis Napoleon by force and violence overthrew the republic of France which he was sworn to protect, and in its stead he erected an empire. He called that peace; but subsequent events have shown that it was not peace but war, bloody, cruel war, civil as well as foreign. In my opinion the peace that these gentlemen propose to establish in the South would be very much of the same character. Are the people of this country prepared to purchase such a peace at such a price? I hope not. If they are, I, for one, am prepared to say that that peace which reigned when George III ruled this country had better never have been disturbed.

So far from assenting to the proposition that peace is the result of democratic rule, I must take the very opposite. I assert, with the light of history before my eyes, that the democratic party in the South is a party of disorder, intolerance, and violence. I need not go so far back as to call your attention to the time—I think it has already been done by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN]—when under a democratic administration, at the dictation of the democracy of the South, an attempt was made to fasten slavery upon the unwilling people of Kansas. Need I call your attention to the time when the democracy, having failed to poll the required number of votes to elect their candidate for the Presidency, plunged this nation into one of the most gigantic civil wars known to modern times, the evil effects of which are being felt all over this nation to-day, and are the very causes of the condition of affairs in Louisiana which we are this moment considering?

It is not altogether the thing nowadays, I believe, to refer to that portion of the history of our country included between the firing on Sumter and the surrender at Appomattox. I shall therefore pass over that; but I desire to call your attention to a later period. Do you not remember, sir, after the belligerents of both sides had disbanded, how the democracy of the South, with the blood of the rebellion scarcely dry upon their garments, demanded of this nation that the reins of Government should be immediately placed in their hands, and that they should be allowed to fix the status of the late slaves without interference on the part of the Federal Government? When you call to mind their black codes, their labor and vagrant laws, how they resisted in every way any attempt not alone to give the colored man the ballot, but to even allow him to testify in the courts—when you call these things to mind, you may well imagine, Mr. President, what that status would have been. But they failed in this. Then what followed? It must be fresh in the minds of all that in many of the Southern States a secret organization, perhaps the most bloody and damnable ever known in any civilized country, sprang into existence. You remember how difficult it was to call the attention of the people of this nation to that organization. You remember that during two years, by reason of secrecy, of perjury, and all the appliances of organized crime, this organization ran over the liberties of some of the States of this Union, leaving blood in its pathway wherever it went; and yet the people of this country could not be made to believe that it was more than a myth, a phantom conjured up by radical brains to carry elections by. We were told then that we were engaging in "the outrage business"—not perhaps in that language, but that was the meaning of it. I think perhaps when two more years have rolled away we may convince a too incredulous people that what was the Ku-Klux organization of yesterday is the White League organization of to-day. Perhaps after a few thousand more human lives are sacrificed the people of this country may be convinced of that fact.

But, sir, after we were enabled, in the face of great opposition from the other side of this Chamber, to tear aside the veil which hid the hideous features of this monster and direct the public eye to it, what was the course of the democracy then? When they could no longer hide it they undertook to excuse it; they said they did not know anything about it; but these things, if they did exist, were the result of radical misrule in the South, of increased taxation, of negro office-holding, &c.

Mr. President, you heard the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] call attention to some testimony which was given, I think, by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] before the Ku-Klux committee. You recollect that that Senator under oath said that the Ku-Klux organization may have existed in 1866 or 1867. If that is so, why was it that they raised these excuses of bad government under reconstruction? For did not reconstruction follow some time after that? In the State of Arkansas, as early as the fall of 1868, at a time when the debt of that State had not been increased one single dollar, at a time when no officer was charged with malfeasance or misfeasance in office, at a time when with the single exception of one State senator and five representatives there was not in all the departments of the government of that State a single colored man in office—at that time this organization was able to draw to its ranks in Arkansas as many as thirty thousand men. I am aware of the responsibility which rests upon me when I make that declaration. It was my business at that time, while I had the honor of being chief executive of that State, to inquire into that organization and make myself familiar with it. By means of the employment of one of its officers I was enabled to get the constitution, the ritual, the signs, the grips, and the pass-words of the order. This enabled me to put the key in the hands of my detectives, whereby they could enter their dens, participate in their proceedings, and accompany them upon their expeditions. It was a dangerous work; one poor fellow lost his life in the attempt, the horrible details of which I wish I had time to recount. I will say in brief, that after having obtained their secrets, he was so indiscreet as to write to me, which letter, through the connivance of the postmaster, himself a member of the Klan, was delivered to an officer of the order. The sentence of death was immediately passed upon him, which was that night carried into execution by a detachment of the Klan, who arrested him and carried him to an abandoned farm, where he was compelled to kneel at the brink of an open well. He was told if he had any prayers to say, to do so at once. He replied he could not pray; whereupon a member of the Klan, who was a leader in the church, volunteered to do so for him. After an affecting prayer the command was given to fire. His body was riddled with bullets and cast into the well.

At this time a Presidential election was pending, and although I was possessed with full information concerning the acts and intentions of the organization, so determined was I that it should not be said that among my first acts as chief executive of the State I had put the militia in the field to control elections, I resolved to suspend the suppression of this murderous clan until after the elections were over. But in making that resolve I was more severely tried than I ever expect to be again. I was the recipient nearly every day of reports of murder and violence all over the State, a few cases of which I will now enumerate, but only a few of the most prominent cases.

A. M. Johnson, a member of the Legislature, was shot in the back by Ku-Klux in ambush while he was in the act of accompanying his wife and children to the steamboat landing to be conveyed beyond the danger which he felt in the very air. Stephen Wheeler, a State senator, while riding along the road in a buggy with another gentleman, was arrested by mounted Ku-Klux and carried into the brush. At he went there, he determined to take one desperate chance for life; he sprang into a brier thicket near by, and in doing so was fired upon and badly wounded. He fell. They left him for dead while they pursued his comrade. After a great many hardships and dangers, he succeeded in making his way into Little Rock.

A. J. Millen, another member of the Legislature, while following the hearse containing the dead body of his wife, was fired upon from ambush by these "gentlemen" of the mask, and severely wounded.

E. J. Parker, another member of the Legislature, while sitting at his window, was fired upon from without and severely wounded, having upon a previous occasion lost an arm in precisely the same manner in another county of the State.

James Hinds, a member of the Congress of the United States, while peaceably riding along the road in company with Hon. Joseph Brooks to attend a public discussion, was fired upon and instantly killed by a member of the Klan who was also secretary of the democratic county committee; and Hon. Joseph Brooks, whom I see present in this Chamber, was at the same time severely wounded; he carries in his body to-day the lead that he received on that occasion. I will say here that the very gentleman who did this deed, a few days before participated in what was called a peace meeting of the democracy; he took a prominent part in it; he was so anxious to convince the country that the democracy were peaceable. After he killed this member of Congress and wounded Hon. Joseph Brooks, he rode leisurely back to the county-seat near by, put his horse away, set his gun in a corner, and went to bed and slept there until morning. Although many of the citizens of that town knew that he had done the deed, he slept there quietly until the morning, and then leisurely had his horse saddled and rode off. I learned afterward that the Ku-Klux passed him from county to county until they passed him beyond the line of the State of Arkansas into the State of Texas.

These are a few of the prominent cases which transpired during that memorable campaign. If I were to recount the many other cases of officers, and especially of poor unoffending negroes, who were murdered and outraged at that time by this organization, I should fatigue your ear and occupy more time than I can devote to this branch of the subject. I will say, however, that after the election was over and the militia of the State was called out to grapple with this monster and make him unloose his hold from the throat of the State, the Little Rock Gazette, the then organ of the Ku-Klux of the State and the present organ of the democracy, with the very impudence of Satan himself, charged me with making war upon a peaceable and unoffending people! Mr. President, if making war upon murderers and assassins who knew no law and respected no human rights was making war upon a peaceable and unoffending people, then I plead guilty to the charge, and I am only sorry that that public sentiment which would not believe that these things existed at that day prevented me from making that warfare as thorough and complete as I desired and as the interests of humanity demanded.

But we are told, and I have seen a dispatch within the last two or three days from a gentleman who I believe signs himself "A. H. Garland, governor of Arkansas"—I say he signs himself in that way—in which he says to the President, "We have no Ku-Klux or white-leaguers in Arkansas;" and he goes on to say that he has called the attention of the grand jury to a petition which I introduced this morning from 204 Federal soldiers, who seem to take a somewhat different view of the case. "We have no Ku-Klux or white-leaguers in Arkansas." All I have to say is that if Ku-Klux and white-leaguers only existed in name, then perhaps they have no Ku-Klux or white-leaguers in Arkansas. Now, mark what I say, Ku-Klux and white-leaguers are only used by the democracy of the South to obtain power. When they get the power in their own hands, then their Ku-Klux and white-leaguers are suddenly transformed into State militia. It is a great deal more convenient to have them operate as State militia. They are armed by the State, equipped by the State, provided with ammunition by the State; and what was once a grand cyclops of a Ku-Klux Klan, by a little stroke of the pen of the governor becomes a captain of a company of State militia. Under the sacred forms of law they are then enabled to trample more effectually on the rights of peaceable people. I say to A. H. Garland, who styles himself "governor of Arkansas," that the men who rallied to the Ku-Klux Klans of 1868 and 1869, who afterward became white-leaguers, are the men who to-day constitute the great bulk of his State militia, and it is very disingenuous for him to say "we have no Ku-Klux or white-leaguers in Arkansas," when he knows they have merely changed their name. And it is very natural for the New York Tribune to say "at last we have a governor in Arkansas who knows his business!"

I desire to make some further remarks in answer to the proposition asserted on the other side of this Chamber, that wherever democracy has the power in the South peace does prevail. I take just the opposite view of that proposition. I propose first to call your attention to the State of Kentucky, subject to the uninterrupted rule of the democracy for the past ten years. I think at one time they carried that State by a majority of some ninety thousand. What a splendid opportunity was afforded to the democracy in this State to demonstrate what they assert as true in this Chamber. I propose to call in an authority upon the subject of the peace which reigns in Kentucky, which is not republican, not tainted by carpet-baggery or scalawaggery, but a high-toned, southern, Kentucky, conservative authority. I propose to read from the Louisville Courier-Journal, a paper of national reputation and of unquestioned respectability. I quote:

The law against carrying concealed weapons is a dead letter. Every coward and bully goes armed. Every case of manslaughter goes unpunished. Every case of shooting with intent to kill passes by as an amusing episode, provided there is no funeral. Even the most atrocious, cold-blooded, deliberate, malignant, dastardly assassinations have left no mark on the statute-books except the mark of acquittal purchased by money or intimidation. Red-handed murderers occupy places of responsibility and trust. * * * There are at this moment fifty cases of homicide on our criminal docket, which ought to be recorded as murder cases, where the defendant is at large on bail, with the least possible danger of an adverse result. There are five hundred cases of petty shooting with intent to kill which will never come to trial. * * * In a word, there is no security for life, because there is no law for those who take it, in Kentucky, and has not been this many a year.

Mr. President, is that a description of peace?

Mr. MORTON. What is the date of that?

Mr. CLAYTON. I had occasion to make allusion to this extract in a speech that I delivered in September before a mixed audience of republicans and democrats in Little Rock. At that time I clipped the extract from the paper. I looked in the Library this morning, but I find that the numbers there do not run quite so far back as that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Where does the Senator read the extract from?

Mr. CLAYTON. From the Louisville Courier-Journal. But I have another here, if the Senator desires it, of very near the same character.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear the Senator when he commenced.

Mr. CLAYTON. I apprehend no one will deny that this is a correct extract. I take the responsibility of saying that it is. I cannot give the exact date, but it was some time either in the latter part of the summer or early part of the fall of last year.

I come now to the State of Texas, which has lately been under the democracy. It is true some people think there was some little informality attending the manner in which they got possession of that State, but I will not dwell upon that now. I read from another democratic authority, and I am informed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. FLANAGAN] that it is the oldest authority of the kind in the State, and therefore it is not tainted with carpet-bagism. I read from the Houston Telegraph:

The laws are not enforced; prisoners in the clutches of the law are seized by irresponsible mobs and surreptitiously hung. Thieves, robbers, and murderers are a terror to good citizens, inasmuch as they justify and possibly take part in these summary proceedings. Doubtless these proceedings are winked at, if not connived at, by the officers. It is not possible that a sheriff gives up his prisoner, unless with a willing or a half-willing consent. It is quite certain lawlessness must be stopped, or we shall retrograde in population, in purse, and the Texas of which so many proud things have been said may become a danger and a dread to all travelers and would-be settlers in her borders.

Is that a description of peace? And was it a peaceable thing for a company from that State to invade the State of Louisiana and participate in that most terrible massacre which took place at Coushatta?

I come now to the State of Tennessee, handed over by treachery some five years ago to democratic rule. Here, too, has been a good chance for the democracy to demonstrate what our friends have said about the peace which exists in the democratic States of the South. I will read now from the official report of the United States district attorney for the western district of Tennessee in relation to that horrible affair which took place in Trenton, in Gibson County in that State, last fall. This communication is addressed to the Attorney-General of the United States:

In reply, I have the honor to say that from affidavits now on file in my office the following facts appear: Since the election on the 6th of August last, bands of men, armed and in disguise and known as the Ku-Klux Klan, have been riding through certain portions of Gibson County, in this district, almost every night, committing outrages upon the colored people, in some instances whipping them and in others threatening to kill them; and on Saturday night, August 16, a number of colored people were shot at on their return home from church by certain of these masked men. An old negro named Joshua was severely whipped, and at the same time was told by the Ku-Klux that they should again visit him on Saturday night, August 22. Thereupon on that night several of his colored neighbors started to go and assist the old man in defending himself, and on the way thither were met by a party of men, armed, mounted, and in disguise, who first fired upon them, they returning the fire, and either killing or wounding a mule, whereupon both parties fled.

This is, as I suppose, "the conspiracy to take the lives of the white citizens of the neighborhood," for which "sixteen negroes were committed to the jail of Gibson County in this State," referred to in Governor Brown's telegram. The next day, Sunday, the State authorities commenced arresting the black men in the vicinity, almost indiscriminately, taking, among others, two colored preachers out of their churches. The prisoners so arrested were confined and guarded to await their preliminary trial the next day. During that night some of these prisoners were taken out of the building in which they were confined, by some of the guard, and by means of threats, and in one instance by hanging the prisoner to a tree, confessions were extorted from them, which confessions, so obtained, were used as testimony against them in their examination before the committing court.

That is bad enough of itself, without going further; but I shall proceed further. I still read:

During Monday and Tuesday, August 24 and 25, sixteen black men were committed to the jail of the county; fourteen as criminals, the other two as witnesses against them. They were conducted on foot to the jail, a distance of eleven miles, bound together with trace-chains about their necks secured by padlocks, twelve being committed on Monday and four on Tuesday, while the sheriff's posse who conveyed them thither were mounted. On their way to the jail, on Monday, two attempts were made by armed men in disguise to obtain possession of these colored prisoners, twelve in number, but the attempts were unsuccessful. Fourteen of the prisoners were confined together in a small cell in the jail, two being left in the hall of the jail. On Tuesday night, August 25, a band of masked men, armed and generally mounted, variously estimated to number from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty, surrounded the jail, forcibly entered it, took out those sixteen colored prisoners, tied them together with ropes, marched them a few hundred yards distant to a bridge crossing a small river, and commenced shooting them indiscriminately, then and there killing four and wounding others, one of whom has since died of his wounds, and some are known to have escaped.

Mr. COOPER. Will not the Senator from Arkansas permit the Clerk to finish the reading of the report?

Mr. CLAYTON. I want it.

Mr. COOPER. The whole of it?

Mr. CLAYTON. I should have done so if the Senator had not asked for it; but you have heard a great deal said, sir, in the public prints of the noble manner in which the authorities of Tennessee came to the rescue and undertook to punish these criminals. The remainder of this report will show you how they did that thing, and I shall ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

As soon as these facts were properly brought to my attention by those who could testify positively in the matter, on the requisite affidavits being made, I caused United States commissioner's warrants to issue to the marshal of this district for the apprehension of such of the parties as I believed to be guilty from the testimony then in my possession, as provided in the acts of Congress passed respectively May 31, 1870, and April 20, 1871, upon which several of the parties so charged fled the country, and nine were arrested on the charge of violating certain sections of said acts of Congress.

These nine prisoners were allowed bail. A full examination, of two days' duration, was had before the commissioner; many witnesses were examined; three able attorneys appeared in their defense; and no effort was spared to make the examination full, fair, and complete. Three of those charged by the warrants were released by the commissioner, and six of them were held under bonds to await the action of the grand jury. Our court convened on the 21st ultimo, since which time these matters have been diligently inquired into by the grand jury of this district, and sixteen men have been indicted already, and others probably will be as soon as the testimony can be adduced. I have great difficulty in securing proof against the parties engaged in this transaction, and in some instances witnesses do not obey the process of the court, and I am obliged to have writs of attachment issued in order to secure their attendance. Such, in brief, are the facts as shown in the manner above stated, and the testimony before the grand jury does not, in any material points, contradict them, and the above are, in a few words, "the steps * * * taken for the prosecution of the parties charged with the outrage committed in Gibson County."

As to "what necessity, if any, there is * * * for proceedings on the part of the United States to punish the offenders in that case," I have respectfully to submit that the crime committed was an open and palpable violation of the acts of Congress above referred to, attended with circumstances of the most revolting and aggravating character, and if any crime has been committed in this district since my appointment as prosecuting officer thereof which emphatically calls for action on the part of the United States, this is par excellence that crime.

I should consider myself grossly derelict in the performance of my official duties had I taken no steps for the vindication of the laws thus grossly outraged. Besides, I received from your office a letter or circular of date September 3d, ultimo, "issued by the authority of the President, and with the concurrence of the Secretary of War," signed by yourself and directed to me, officially directing me, in view of such circumstances as are detailed in this communication, "to proceed with all possible energy and dispatch to detect, expose, arrest, and punish the perpetrators" of such crimes, and my action in these matters seems to me to be fully warranted by the express directions contained in said letter or circular.

If, however, your communication is intended to inquire what necessity, if any, there is in my judgment for commencing these prosecutions on the part of the United States in view of the fact that some of the parties supposed to be guilty had been indicted in the State court, I have to say that I am reliably informed that only a small number of those indicted in this court are indicted in the State court at all for this offense; and even if they all were, as I understand the law, while the State court undoubtedly has jurisdiction of crimes such as these committed against the dignity of the State, so have the Federal courts of like crimes committed against the peace and dignity of the United States; yet I conceive the offenses to be distinct, being violations of separate and distinct laws, each complete in itself, and the punishment of a violation of one of such laws does not vindicate an outrage upon the other. There are numerous instances in which the single act committed may be a violation of State and Federal statutes in this manner, in which a prosecution of the one offense is no bar to the prosecution of the other.

As to the prosecution of the parties in the State courts, I am reliably informed that the forty-one men supposed to be guilty are there indicted, not for murder, but under the section of the code of the State cited in Governor Brown's telegram to the President. These men also are all indicted in the State court in a joint indictment. Section 4014 of the State code provides that, "in the trial of all criminal prosecutions above the grade of petit larceny, the State is entitled to ten peremptory challenges, and the defendant, if the charge is of felony punishable with death, to thirty-five challenges, and in all other cases to twenty-four." The decisions of the supreme court of the State go to this extent, that where "a conviction might affect the life" of the defendant, he is entitled to the thirty-five challenges. (State vs. Humphries, 1 Tennessee, 306; Hooper vs. State, 5 Yerger, 422.) And where several defendants are jointly tried, each of them is entitled to the number of peremptory challenges allowed by law, as though he were tried separately, and although his codefendants should pass the juror challenged. (Hill vs. State, 2 Yerger, 246; Blackburn vs. Hays, 4 Coldwell, 227; Allen vs. State, 7 ibid., 357.)

This, then, gives those defendants in the State court each thirty-five peremptory challenges under the law, amounting in all to fourteen hundred and thirty-five, besides the numerous challenges for cause. There is, moreover, no law of the State compelling those defendants to sever upon their trial, nor by which the State can change the venue, without the consent of the defendants. It will be perceived how very difficult, if not impossible, it will be to ever bring those defendants to a trial upon the indictment found in the State court. But the same objection does not apply to a trial of the guilty parties in the Federal court of this district, as the peremptory challenges therein are but twenty for each defendant, and there are twenty-one counties from which the Federal jury is summoned. There are also various grounds of prejudice, which will readily suggest themselves to you, existing in the local court which could not exist in this court, and I am well convinced the parties indicted here can have a full, fair, and impartial trial.

I have endeavored thus fully to answer your communication, in order that you may be made fully acquainted with the facts and circumstances of these cases, and in order that you might be better enabled to form your conclusion in the premises. I shall most cheerfully comply with any instructions received from your office relative to these prosecutions. Begging pardon for so much delay in answer to your communication,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. W. MURRAY,
United States Attorney.

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator let that document be read through?

Mr. CLAYTON. Let me go on with my remarks first.

Mr. COOPER. Let the Clerk finish reading the whole document.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will give the Senator, after I finish, all the opportunity to read documents that he wants; and I am under obligation to him for calling for the reading of the rest of this report. Some of you perhaps have seen the assertion throughout the newspapers, especially the so-called independent papers, that the authorities of Tennessee were taking the necessary steps to bring these murderers to justice. Now, I want to show what steps were taken, and I will call your attention to what has been read. Some of you may not have heard it distinctly. In the first place, after these offenses were committed, the United States district attorney undertook to try them before the United States court, whereupon the governor of the State—and if I do not state it correctly the Senator from Tennessee will please correct me——

Mr. COOPER. Do I understand the Senator to say that the United States court started the prosecution?

Mr. CLAYTON. It started a prosecution.

Mr. COOPER. The State authorities had taken control and had drawn the indictments over a month before the United States court intervened.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I make any misstatement, I am glad to be corrected. I have no doubt but what the Senator from Tennessee is more familiar with the facts than I am. I do not want to misstate anything. I want the facts. At any rate the United States court undertook to take jurisdiction of those offenses, whereupon the governor of Tennessee called upon the President or Attorney-General to withdraw all proceedings in the United States court and allow the State courts to settle these questions. Now, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee whether the governor of his State was not present with the State district attorney when these indictments were found in the State courts?

Mr. COOPER. He was on the ground within twenty-four hours.

Mr. CLAYTON. And at the trial?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, sir; and at the trial.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I wanted to know. Let us see how these men were brought to punishment. It seems that the law of Tennessee, in cases affecting the life of any citizen, allows the defendant thirty-five peremptory challenges besides others for cause. Is that true?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. It also allows offenders to be indicted separately or jointly. Is that true?

Mr. COOPER. No, sir; they must be indicted jointly for offenses of the same character committed by all together.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then it remains a joint indictment?

Mr. CONKLING. They may have a separate trial if they so elect, probably.

Mr. COOPER. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggested that probably the parties indicted could demand a separate trial, although indicted jointly.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; for cause the trial can be separate of course.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now let me proceed. I think I understand this part of the question. Now here were forty-one prisoners about whom the governor of the State was conferring with the district attorney, who were indicted jointly. Each prisoner having thirty-five peremptory challenges, it follows that the forty-one would have fourteen hundred and thirty-five peremptory challenges, besides those for cause. And in addition to that, if the district attorney should happen to sympathize with the gentlemen, he can exhaust ten more for each, making in all about eighteen hundred challenges, independent of those for cause. Now, who supposes that these forty-one criminals are going to separate their trials? A separation cannot be had under the laws of Tennessee unless the defendant asks for separation. These forty-one criminals can go into that court and they can exhaust over fourteen hundred peremptory challenges. The State attorney, if he should happen to sympathize with any of them, as I think he does—I will not say why I think so; he is a very good democrat—the district attorney can exhaust ten more, making eighteen hundred challenges under the laws of Tennessee. And they cannot go to another county to get jurors, can they?

Mr. COOPER. Not without the consent of the defendants.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not without the consent of the defendants. That is what I wanted to know. They cannot change the venue, can they?

Mr. COOPER. Not without the consent of the defendant.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not without the consent of the defendant. Then I say these eighteen hundred challenges will cover nearly all the freeholders, if not quite, in that county. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. No, sir; we vote thirty-five hundred in that county, and every voter is a juror.

Mr. CLAYTON. Suppose, then, we take it at thirty-five hundred. Here are eighteen hundred out of thirty-five hundred. Is the county democratic or republican?

Mr. COOPER. Republican slightly, I think.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have heard the reverse. I would like to know about that.

Mr. COOPER. I should have said that it is slightly democratic.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have heard it asserted that it is very largely democratic.

Mr. COOPER. It has a large republican vote, but the majority is probably slightly democratic.

Mr. CLAYTON. My friend now says it is slightly democratic. Therefore it takes nearly one-half of these thirty-five hundred; and the Senator puts a large figure.

Mr. SPENCER. How many white republicans are in the county?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, how many white republicans are there?

Mr. COOPER. I think very few. I do not know. There is one district probably from which these men who are indicted come which is altogether republican. They come from what is called Skullbones, and they are all republicans there.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then it seems these republicans are nearly all negroes?

Mr. COOPER. There are white republicans in Skullbones.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am speaking about the republicans in the county.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; they are nearly all negroes in the county.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now we find eighteen hundred democratic freeholders in that county, and the rest are negroes.

Mr. COOPER. The negroes are all competent jurors, too.

Mr. CLAYTON. No doubt of it; but when eighteen hundred negroes come into the jury-box, with those democratic criminals to challenge them, does any one believe a negro would be allowed to sit in such a case?

Mr. COOPER. Does the honorable Senator say that those men were indicted by the Federal court alone?

Mr. CLAYTON. No.

Mr. COOPER. Two-thirds of them were indicted by the State court.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would not be surprised if that was so. I have heard it said that the men whom the State court indicted were not, indeed, after all, the perpetrators of the crime.

Mr. COOPER. But six were indicted both by the State court and the Federal court.

Mr. CLAYTON. How many were indicted in the Federal court?

Mr. COOPER. I think six were indicted in the Federal court and discharged by the Federal court.

Mr. CLAYTON. Discharged by the Federal court?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; dismissed for want of jurisdiction; and it has been said that they were republicans.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the first time I ever heard that any of these men indicted were republicans. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. COOPER. I have only heard the rumor.

Mr. CLAYTON. But I have heard it charged that the men indicted by the State court were not the men who committed these crimes.

Mr. COOPER. They were exactly the same who were indicted by the Federal court; precisely the same.

Mr. CLAYTON. They could not be precisely the same, because the Federal court only indicted a small number and the State court indicted forty-one.

Mr. COOPER. But the men indicted by the Federal court were indicted by the State court. That is what I say.

Mr. CLAYTON. The eight or ten indicted by the Federal court may have been indicted too by the State court.

Mr. COOPER. Yes, sir; they were.

Mr. CLAYTON. But a great many others were indicted. Now I want to come back to this question. I do not want to get away from it. I want to ascertain how these men, whether they are republicans or democrats, are to be convicted before that court. Eighteen hundred men can be challenged, fifteen hundred peremptorily and a large number for cause.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator allow me to tell him that that has been the law of Tennessee since the constitution of 1834; and since this transaction has happened the governor, himself a democrat, has called the attention of the Legislature to that law and has suggested its amendment, and earnestly besought them to remedy it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not say who is responsible for this law. I have not said who is responsible for it. I am not on the question of responsibility for laws on the statute-book; but it seems to me that as the democratic party has been in power there for five years, they might have amended these laws if they are imperfect, and that they ought to have done it.

Now, Mr. President, I have the official vote of Gibson, which the Senator at first said he believed was republican.

Mr. COOPER. I was thinking of Carroll County when I said that I thought it was slightly republican. I was mistaken in the county.

Mr. CLAYTON. First he said he thought it was republican. Then he said he thought it was slightly democratic. Now, Greeley's Almanac says that the last vote in Gibson County was 2,814 democratic—nearly 3,000—and 750 republican. Therefore it is slightly democratic.

Mr. COOPER. Have you got the last census?

Mr. CLAYTON. Here is the last record, from which you find that you have in that county seven hundred and fifty republicans who could sit upon the trial of these cases, provided they were not challenged, and they are negroes nearly all of them. Does anybody suppose that they would not be challenged? If they do, they have more credulity than I have. Does anybody suppose those criminals will not challenge the most respectable democrats, too, who are sitting upon that jury? If you do, you have more credulity than I have. I say that, with the light of this information before us, it is almost certain that none of those men could be convicted in the State courts of Tennessee; and I say further, if any one of those men should be convicted for the murder of negroes, it would be the first instance that I know of where any democrat was convicted in Tennessee or any other Southern State for the murder of a negro.

Mr. COOPER. Then, Mr. President, I have to say it is because of the want of information of the Senator from Arkansas. There are many such cases.

Mr. CLAYTON. How many cases are there in your own State?

Mr. COOPER. A good many.

Mr. CLAYTON. Name one.

Mr. COOPER. I do not propose to do that. I propose that you shall inform yourself.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like for you to name one. I assert here, and I know what I assert with all the responsibility of a Senator upon me, that in the State of Arkansas, of the five hundred and eighty-seven democrats who have murdered and attempted to murder negroes, in no single instance has any one of those offenders been made to suffer the extreme penalty of the law. Does the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] know of any instance in his State where a white democrat has been executed for killing a negro? He does not reply.

Mr. NORWOOD. The honorable Senator seems to be upon a general investigation to-day. I supposed he rose to inform the Senate of what he knew, and not to interrogate others as to what they know.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am seeking information, and naturally go to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NORWOOD. The Senator had better inform himself before he attempts to instruct the Senate and inform the country. The Senator from Georgia will be heard from further after the Senator from Arkansas gets through.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am seeking information, and if the Senator does not desire to give it, I, of course, will not find fault. I would like to go further, and ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] if he knows of any instance in his State where a white democrat has suffered the extreme penalty of the law for the murder of a negro?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the Senator from Arkansas had better inform himself what the laws are before he interrogates other Senators. Does he know what the law of Kentucky is?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not know what the law is, and I am seeking information.

Mr. STEVENSON. Just now you said you did not know of a Southern State that had inflicted the extreme penalty of the law. I will tell you Kentucky has done it time and again.

Mr. CLAYTON. Has any white democrat suffered death for killing a negro?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not intend to let the Senator interrogate me in that manner. I say that I refused while governor to interfere with the punishment of white men for the murder of negroes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator intend to lead the Senate to believe that he knows of many cases in Kentucky where white democrats have been executed for the murder of colored men?

Mr. STEVENSON. In the execution of the law it is only in Arkansas I believe that they look to the politics of the criminal. Kentucky looks not to the politics of the criminal. Kentucky punishes republicans as she would democrats and democrats as she would republicans. Perhaps it is different with you; it is not in Kentucky. Now I say I would scorn myself as either governor or a citizen to inquire whether I should excuse a criminal for his politics, and therefore I cannot answer whether Kentucky has punished democrats or republicans. She has punished all if they have been convicted under the law, as far as I know.

One more word. I said to the Senator that he had better read the law. He wants to know whether they have ever been hung? Kentucky's criminal law leaves it to the jury to say whether they shall be imprisoned for life or whether they shall be hung. In regard to that punishment, while I do not intend to excuse Kentucky—God forbid!—there have been in Kentucky, as everywhere else, men acquitted who ought to have been convicted, and I do not intend for any party purposes to dishonor myself or to dishonor my country by saying that Kentucky is free from all blame for that; but if you want to compare notes between Kentucky and Arkansas, either in the punishment of crime or in purity of the administration of the government, I am ready for you whenever you want to enter into that comparison.

Mr. CLAYTON. It seems the Senator is through with his speech, but he has not answered my question. It seems he is not able to answer it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Tell me what it is.

Mr. CLAYTON. Just one minute, if you please.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am ready to give an answer to any question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to go on with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Chair would remind Senators that these colloquies are out of order. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. CLAYTON. I asked for information. So far as relates to what the Senator from Kentucky says about the law being executed in Kentucky, I leave him and the editor of the Courier-Journal to fight that question out. The editor of the Courier-Journal says it is not executed, and red-handed murderers roam at large over that State. You have heard what I read.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear what the Senator read, and I am sorry I was not in at the time.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator can read it, then, in the RECORD to-morrow, and can answer it at his pleasure. I propose, with the permission of the Chair, to go a little further right here in seeking for information. If the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] were here, I would ask him if he knows of any instance where a white democrat has been executed for murdering a negro in his State; but he is not here, I see. I will ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. ROBERTSON] if he knows of any such instance? He does not know of any. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] if he knows of any such instance?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. How many?

Mr. MERRIMON. More than one.

Mr. CLAYTON. How many?

Mr. MERRIMON. More than one. I cannot call them to mind at this moment, but I recollect one not long ago.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can you give the names of the parties?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not recollect the names, but I believe the case was tried at Wilmington and the man was executed. Not more than six months ago two men were tried and convicted for killing a man in Johnson County. They were sentenced to death, and the republican governor commuted their sentence to imprisonment for life. They are in the penitentiary now.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator speaks of cases, but he cannot give the names.

Mr. MERRIMON. While the Senator is on that point, I would like to read a statute. I believe he, or some other Senator, asked me the other day what was the provision of the statute of North Carolina touching the killing of a slave. Our statute provided before the war that the offense of killing a slave should be homicide, and "shall partake of the same degree of guilt when accompanied with the like circumstances as homicide at common law." More than that, where a slave was charged with a capital offense, our statute required that his master should defend him and that he should pay the costs of the defense.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator says he knows of one case——

Mr. MERRIMON. I say I know of more than one case. There have been repeated cases in North Carolina where the law has been executed on white men for killing black men.

Mr. CLAYTON. How recent are they?

Mr. MERRIMON. The one I gave you a while ago occurred not more than two years since.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can you give any other case since the war?

Mr. MERRIMON. I gave you another just now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I said a case where the extreme penalty of the law was executed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I gave you a case which happened not more than two years ago, where a party was executed for killing a negro.

Mr. CLAYTON. One case.

Mr. MERRIMON. There are other cases.

Mr. CLAYTON. And that was a white man, if I understood the Senator.

Mr. MERRIMON. If I had time to look up the records in North Carolina I could find many such cases.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like much to see them.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is no distinction made in North Carolina in the administration of justice. The whole judiciary at one time, with one exception, I believe, were republicans. There are two or three exceptions now. The supreme judiciary is altogether republican. We have a republican governor and a democratic Legislature. Peace prevails from one end of my State to the other. The republican governor in sending his message to the Legislature in November last congratulates the people of the State and all parties upon the peaceful condition of our affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe the Senator said he was a republican governor. I think men differ somewhat about that. I have heard a difference of opinion expressed as to whether the governor of North Carolina was a republican or not.

Mr. MERRIMON. He is one of the most ultra republicans in North Carolina. I do not reckon anybody ever questioned that except the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLAYTON. Suppose that is so; does that change the question I have asked so far as his pardoning out this man was concerned? Is not that but another instance where the extreme penalty of the law was not enforced?

Mr. MERRIMON. I suppose he was satisfied that the extreme penalty of the law ought not to be imposed in that case. I do not know anything about it, only that the governor did commute the sentence to imprisonment for life.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to ask the other Southern Senators if they know of any instance where white democrats have been executed for the murder of negroes? I do not hear any further answer to my question. Now, suppose I would ask this question: Does any Senator here from a Southern State know of any instance where negroes have been executed for the murder of white men? If that question were to be answered the whole of this day would probably be occupied in enumerating the instances. They have not only been executed by the officers of the law, but they have been executed by the hundreds, and I may say by the thousands, by men who were acting under Judge Lynch's authority. When a colored man murders a white man, it is heralded all over this country, from one end to the other. When a white man murders a colored man, it scarcely makes a ripple upon the surface of the locality where it takes place, much less beyond.

But I was going on to say——

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator now allow the reading of that document to be finished?

Mr. CLAYTON. What does the Senator desire to have read?

Mr. COOPER. Both the executive communication and then an account of what was done in the Federal courts—the district attorney's communication.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have just read that.

Mr. COOPER. No; I mean the last communication from the district attorney.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am afraid this printed matter will take too much time to read. I would prefer that the Senator would get up and state the substance of the communication.

Mr. COOPER. No; let it be read.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is very long.

Mr. MORTON. Let the Senator from Tennessee have it read as a part of his speech.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I suppose the Senator proposes to address the Senate on this subject, and he can then bring it in.

Mr. COOPER. O, no; let it all come together.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the Senator just state briefly what it contains. I would prefer that.

Mr. COOPER. If you give it to me, I will state exactly what it contains.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is not necessary to read it. The Senators all have it on their tables. [Handing Senate Executive Document No. 12, Forty-third Congress, second session, to Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. COOPER. I will state it, with the permission of the Senator. It is as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Nashville, Tennessee, September 18, 1873.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States, Washington City D. C.:

There were sixteen negroes committed to the jail of Gibson County, in this State, charged with a conspiracy to take the lives of the white citizens of the neighborhood. On the night of the 25th of August, 1874, a party of disguised men violated the jail and took these prisoners forcibly from the jailer and killed four and wounded two, the remainder escaping and now being at large——

Mr. CLAYTON. I must decline to have that read. I see the Senator is reading what I refused to have read. Therefore I decline to yield longer. Let the Senator take his own occasion to have this read, if he desires it, or refute what I have said.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, did not the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Arkansas to decline to yield further.

Mr. COOPER. Can the Senator do that? I make that point of order. Having yielded the floor to allow me to take it, can he now take me off the floor?

Mr. CLAYTON. I said if the Senator would make a short statement of the gist of what this communication contained, he might do so; but I declined to have the communication itself read on account of the time it would occupy that I wanted to devote to other matters. Now, it seems that, instead of making that short statement, the Senator proceeds to read at length these communications. Therefore, I decline to be further interrupted by the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Then the point of order is to be settled by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Arkansas declines to yield further the Chair will be compelled to rule that he is entitled to the floor to the exclusion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. On that, I respectfully appeal from the decision of Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee appeals from the decision of the Chair; and the question is "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what the decision of the Chair was?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose by temporarily yielding the floor a Senator does not yield it entirely.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator yielded the floor for the express purpose for which I was proceeding to occupy it. It is a matter on which I want the decision of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the rule is that where a Senator yields the floor as a matter of courtesy and politeness, he may claim the floor at any time he desires. That seems to me to be the proper rule.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state, as a contribution of fact, as a witness of the occurrence, that the Senator from Arkansas had the floor, and upon the application of the Senator from Tennessee he yielded the floor to the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose of allowing him to make a certain statement, which is here in writing. Now, the question is whether, having given him the floor for that purpose, he has the formal right to resume it at any period of the statement without waiting for the statement to be concluded. That is a question for the decision of the Chair. I may state that there are other apt rules which could govern the case, the rule of that personal decorum which, having given assent to make a statement, would not, even did the formal rule permit, violate the permission implied on yielding the floor. That is not the question for the Senate to decide; that is a law for the breast of any Senator to decide, a question of personal courtesy, what is due himself; but it is, for the purpose of formal and regular debate, whether, when the floor has been yielded formally and deliberately in order to have a statement made, it can be suddenly, at the will of the person yielding it, resumed to the exclusion of the matter which it was understood should be presented to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. As this interrupts the Senator from Arkansas, I shall venture to move to lay this appeal on the table, which motion I shall submit in one moment. I wish first, however, to make this remark: I suppose, if insisted upon, the rule is that no Senator can yield the floor unless he yields it absolutely. Very likely that is true. If, however, he chooses to yield the floor subject to his own resumption, and no objection is made, that, by the usage of the Senate, if not by technical parliamentary law, is his right. Therefore the Senator from Arkansas, as I understand, occupies this position: He yielded to a brother Senator for a purpose, meaning to resume the floor himself. That Senator proceeds at such length, or in such direction, that the Senator entitled to the floor chooses to resume it, and so announces. The Chair sustains his right; and in that ruling the Chair, in my judgment, decides what has always been decided in both Houses, with no instance that I ever heard of to the contrary. I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to lay upon the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair made by the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I was about proceeding to call your attention to that democratic peace which exists in certain States of this Union where they have the control of affairs. I had got as far as Tennessee. I was recounting that terrible massacre which took place at Trenton, when I was led from the line of my remarks by the colloquy that followed. I have read to you a description of that massacre. You have seen it in the public prints. You will all unite in condemning it as being a most horrible thing, a disgrace to civilization and a disgrace to this country. I proceeded to show you how it would be almost utterly impossible under the laws of Tennessee to convict those forty-one men who were indicted. But I was about to go further and show you the condition of peace which exists in that State. Was it a peaceable thing for four hundred men from the State of Tennessee to invade the State of Mississippi some time last summer upon the frivolous pretext of a negro riot there which had no existence? Was that a peaceable thing for the citizens of a democratic State to do? Four hundred men started on a steamboat from Memphis, armed and equipped, and invaded the State of Mississippi at Austin, and sent back for re-enforcements. Then about four hundred more prepared themselves to go to the scene of action. When the first four hundred got there and deployed their forces and marched into the town, they found no one there to break the peace but themselves.

Is that a condition of democratic peace? Take the affair which took place at Somerville, in the State of Tennessee, where three companies of men went from Memphis to that town, armed and equipped, to put down what they called a negro riot, and when they got there found the mayor in bed asleep and no one aware of any riot, no one but these armed men being present to break the peace. Was it a peaceable condition of affairs in Georgia for a company of armed men called, I believe, the "Georgia Tigers"—an appropriate name, but not so appropriate perhaps as "Georgia hyenas"—to invade the State of South Carolina last summer on some frivolous pretext connected with a negro rising, which they found to have no existence when they got upon the ground?

I might go on and read a communication which I have from a citizen of that State, who is a United States commissioner, which would also show the condition of peace which exists in Georgia, but I am admonished that the time is flying rapidly away, and that other Senators desire to speak besides myself.

I have shown you that in these four States at least, where the democracy have the power, there is no peace, no security for life or for property. When you take into consideration their acts of violence and murder in other States of the South to gain possession of the State governments, you can well imagine what kind of peace we should have if the democracy were in power throughout the Southern States. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" Are we to look for peace from the party which resorts to murder and violence to obtain possession of political power? I think not. Are we to turn over to their Ku-Klux Klan, their White Leagues, and their State militia the colored people of this country, amounting to nearly four millions of our population, for protection? That would be to imitate the shepherd who killed his faithful watch-dog and called in the wolves to take charge of his flock. I hope, Mr. President, that that day is not going to come into this country, or if it does come that it will not continue long.

No, Mr. President, we have got to have law in this country, and we have got to have the laws enforced. Murderers and assassins never yet stopped their villainies of their own volition; and your murderers and assassins in the South, if left to themselves, if "let alone," as they say they want to be, they never will stop their murders and their encroachments upon the rights of peaceable citizens. It is an old saying that a dog which has once been caught killing sheep is never cured of the propensity; and I say that a democratic ruffian in the South that has once dipped his hands in the blood of a colored man can never be broken of that habit unless his neck is broken—a remedy rarely adopted under democratic rule in this country, if ever adopted at all, although I believe Senators here can instance three or four cases where it has been adopted in the South.

Mr. President, has it come to this, that men can be murdered by the hundreds and the thousands in portions of this Union without redress? I hope not. I believe it is said that Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, when asked on a certain occasion what government was the best, replied: "That government where an injury done to the meanest subject is an insult to the whole constitution." I very much fear that if that test was applied to some of the governments of the South they would fall far below that definition of a government. The massacre at Colfax, in the State of Louisiana, where thirty-nine men were taken out two by two and deliberately shot, was not only an insult to the people of that State, but an insult to the whole constitution of this country. The massacre at Trenton, of which I have just spoken, was not only an insult to the State of Tennessee, but it was an insult to every State of this Union. The massacre at Vicksburgh, where some seventy or one hundred citizens were killed, was not only an insult to the State of Mississippi, but it was an insult to the whole people of this Union. And so I might go on and enumerate case after case which were not only insults to the whole constitution of this country, but if committed on foreign soil would have led to immediate reparation or war.

Mr. President, we might as well look the facts squarely in the face. This trouble in the South is the same old "irrepressible conflict" of which you have read many years ago.

There is much more that I would like to say on this subject; I have many documents here that I should like to have read, but I know that I am occupying more time than I ought to occupy when I consider that this debate is probably to close to-day. I will therefore conclude by saying that the honorable gentleman who under the Constitution of this country is selected to preside over the Senate, and whose seat you are now temporarily filling, has among the many acts of a useful and laborious life undertaken to hand down to posterity a true statement of some of the most interesting and important events that have marked the history of this country. He has seen fit to style that great work of his The Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America. I have no doubt that when he undertook that task he believed, as the great mass of the people of this country believed, that the slave power in America had indeed fallen never to rise again. But, sir, the sooner the people of this country shake off that delusion the better in my opinion it will be for them. The slave power of this country is not dead. It lives, it moves, it struggles, it aspires to wield the rod of empire over this country. Slavery has many names, but always carries the same weapons, among which are prejudice, proscription, intolerance, and violence. By the vigorous use of those weapons it has been enabled to regain almost all its lost ground in the South. To-day the slave power of this country holds in its grasp practically all of the South except three States—the State of Louisiana, the State of Mississippi, and the State of South Carolina. The former, being the most important of the three, is now naturally the battle-field. That won, then follow Mississippi and South Carolina. Then with a united South, with a larger representation in Congress than they had before the war, with the alliance of some of those States of the North which heretofore assisted them to power, you will find that the slave power, instead of being dead, will be the ruling power of this nation. I hope and trust that that may never be. I hope and trust that the honorable gentleman who has undertaken to write the history of the rise and fall of the slave power in this country may have his years so prolonged, and that God may so order events, that he may yet have the opportunity of recording upon the last pages of his history that peace, security, and equal rights prevail all over this country—north and south, east and west. And when that day comes, if ever it shall come, then he may chronicle the fact that at a certain period the slave power came into existence; at another it was the controlling power of this nation; at still another it plunged the nation into war and fought a desperate fight for supremacy; and that at last it fell never to rise again.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Ohio wish to proceed to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. As to that, I am entirely at the pleasure of the Senate. On Monday next the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has given notice of his intention to call up the legislative and executive appropriation bill, and I will not stand myself in the way of taking up that bill at the hour indicated by him. If the Senate is disposed to postpone this debate until after the consideration of that appropriation bill, I have no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will postpone his remarks now. I shall join him in insisting upon action on that appropriation bill on Monday, and I think we shall soon put that through, and then we can resume this debate. I do not intend to let this debate put the appropriation bill out of its place. Many of us desire to hear the Senator from Ohio; and if it would suit him as well, he can no doubt go on next Tuesday, or as soon as the appropriation bill is acted on, when we can take this matter up again.

Mr. PEASE. I hope that the Senator will agree to let this debate go on. I am very desirous to make a speech upon this subject myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. To-night or to-day?

Mr. PEASE. I should prefer under the circumstances that we adjourn, take up the appropriation bill on Monday, and resume the discussion of this question next week. I am satisfied that no more important question can claim the attention of the Senate than this question of the present condition of the South, and especially of Louisiana. I know that there are a number of Senators who are anxious to speak upon that question; I wish to speak myself; and I hope that the question will be postponed for the present, and that we shall take up the appropriation bill on Monday, and resume this discussion on Tuesday or Wednesday, or at the earliest period practicable.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, retaining the floor on the Louisiana resolution, as it is manifest it is not the desire of the Senate to conclude it to-night, I yield to my friend from Maine to move to take up his bill, so that there shall be no struggle about the appropriation bill on Monday. I will claim the right to speak on the Louisiana question after the conclusion of the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to submit a motion to the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. He yields to the Senator from Maine to submit the motion to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to say one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Maine moves to lay aside the pending resolution and proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice that after the disposition of that appropriation bill I shall ask the Senate to take up and proceed with the consideration of the constitutional amendment reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am not willing to have the consideration of that subject much longer delayed.

Mr. COOPER. May I appeal to the Senator from Maine to allow me just five minutes?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not yielded the floor on the Louisiana question, and will proceed with my remarks if the Senator from Indiana objects to the arrangement proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion to be that of the Senator from Maine to lay aside the pending resolution and take up the appropriation bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we can probably arrange it in this way. I do not wish to stand in the way of the proposition of the Senator from Indiana; but at the same time it is manifestly cruel to the Senate to require six or seven Senators to speak this evening on the Louisiana question. So far as I am concerned I care very little, for I can soon finish. I shall be disposed to vote for the motion of the Senator from Indiana to take up his proposition; but I ask him if he will not consent that one day more be given to this Louisiana question after the disposition of the appropriation bill, and then we can proceed to the consideration of the matter referred to by him?

Mr. GORDON. Allow me to ask the Senator whether he thinks we can get through the Louisiana debate in one day?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think one day and one evening will suffice.

Mr. GORDON. I doubt that very much.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is reasonable anyhow.

Mr. GORDON. I would prefer, rather than agree to that, that the business should go on, so far as I am concerned. I think it is the general wish here to get through with the appropriation bill and then resume this debate for a brief time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the Louisiana debate will occupy more than one day; and on the special message the question of its reference is debatable. I consider that the best thing we can do now is to adjourn; let the appropriation bill be taken up on Monday and disposed of. I do not want to interfere with my friend from Indiana, because I think his measure is an important one.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that this discussion is entirely informal and proceeding only by unanimous consent, the question being on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. COOPER. I appeal to the Senator from Maine, and ask him to withdraw his motion in order that I may have the facts laid before the Senate in one of the cases referred to by the Senator from Arkansas. Do I understand the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Ohio to object?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am on the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Ohio. If he yields to me absolutely, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I simply yield for the Senator's motion, in order to expedite the public business. I think my honorable friend from Tennessee can wait until Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. COOPER. May I not have five minutes to place the facts before the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. By unanimous consent it may be done, I suppose.

Mr. COOPER. I do not propose to make a speech; I will take some other occasion for that; but I want some facts presented.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think under the circumstances I ought to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, because he has had a good part of the document read already during the course of the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say just one word in connection with my motion, so that there may be no mistake about the order of business. I do not expect this appropriation bill, although it is the largest of the series of bills, to occupy a great deal of time; I hope not, at any rate. But I expect to have two other bills ready soon, which will take, I trust, but a brief period; and I should hope that the Senate, before this class of business is interrupted again by the subject now before it, would allow me to finish whatever appropriation bills are ready on Monday.

Mr. MORTON. One word. This is the second week of this debate. I certainly should be sorry to prevent any Senator from expressing his views upon the subject if he desires to do so; but I believe, and I must say to the Senate, that I will on the conclusion of this legislative appropriation bill ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, believing that there is no more important subject that can be brought to the attention of the Senate; and if, after the Senate has concluded its deliberation on that subject, it is then desired to resume the debate on the Louisiana question, I certainly shall have no objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his motion. I should like to say something on the Louisiana question. I have not been able to join in the debate of the last week or ten days, but the people of the South have been so denounced and maligned that really I think as a matter of courtesy the Senate ought to allow every southern Senator who desires to speak an opportunity to be heard. They know more about this matter than anybody else. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press his motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope very much it will not be the will of the Senate to take any step to cut short the debate on the Louisiana question. If it is a matter really of importance that the legislative appropriation bill should be taken up and disposed of, I hope the Senate as soon as it is disposed of will resume the consideration of the Louisiana question. The Senator from Ohio I understood to make that suggestion, that when the appropriation bill is through this subject should be resumed and proceeded with to its close. I desire very much that that should be done. I wish myself to address the Senate on the subject, and I trust the majority of the Senate will not interpose in the way of any Senator who desires to speak. I propose therefore that when the legislative appropriation bill is through, the Louisiana case be taken up again and then disposed of without any further interruption. I trust the Senator from Maine will agree to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as I am concerned, of course that will be at the option of the Senate. It is now a question simply of the order of business. After this appropriation bill shall be disposed of, it will be for the Senate to consider what the next business shall be. I say to my honorable friend from Virginia that it is not within my power to make any arrangement in regard to the suggestion he has made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Having the floor, I yielded to my friend from Maine to make his motion which I think the public business demands. The desire of myself and other Senators to make speeches on the Louisiana question is a matter of little importance compared to the appropriation bills. I am willing to go on to-night, but the Senate is evidently disinclined to that, and I think we had better take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to say to the Senate that I trust the request of the Senator from Virginia will be acceded to, that after the appropriation bill of the Senator from Maine has been passed by the Senate, this debate will be resumed. It is already manifest that a number of gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber desire to be heard further upon this question. As for myself I must say to the Senate that I feel it to be my duty to speak on the Louisiana question. I have sat here in silence for nearly three years and not trespassed on the Senate. It is late this evening; other gentlemen have the floor; numbers have expressed their very great desire to be heard; and I say to the Senate that I feel it to be my duty to ask to be heard upon it. I feel that I should be wanting in all that is due from me to the people whom I undertake to represent on this floor, if I did not ask to be heard. I trust the Senate will accede to the request of the honorable Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SCHURZ. It seems to be the general desire, in the first place, that this debate should be continued so as to give to several Senators who wish to speak an opportunity to do so. I have not any objection to that. On the other hand, everybody seems to be anxious also to do the most necessary business of the sessions. I think we might by general consent agree that on Monday the appropriation bill be taken up, and that we continue this debate after it shall have been disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In any consideration of the order of business, this principal fact should be observed, that we are now on the 16th day of January, and there are only about six weeks left of this session of Congress, and but one appropriation bill has yet passed both branches of Congress; the other twelve remain yet to be considered. Every Senator must see that it has now become an absolute necessity to consider these measures when they are in a condition to be considered, and if we do not practice the utmost economy of time we shall be pressed into the last days of this sesson under such circumstances that it will not be possible for us to conduct the public business with anything like propriety.

Now, if there is a general desire to consider this question further, you ought not to lose one minute, in my judgment. This is as precious an hour as you will have to consider it, and here are gentlemen on all hands desirous of discussing it. Why not proceed this evening and let them make their speeches to-night? Certainly, when there is as great a desire as there seems to be to discuss the question, if gentlemen do not make the utmost economy of time, there will soon be a struggle for the floor here under circumstances which will be unfavorable to the continuation of this debate which has been procrastinated now two weeks, for it will be opposed to that business which every Senator on this floor will be constrained to admit must of necessity have precedence.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why cannot the Senator from Maine take up the appropriation bill now?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend who sits near me [Mr. MORTON] has a proposition which he desires to present, and it should be remembered that this discussion has already consumed a very large proportion of the time which this Congress has to give to any question—a great deal larger than it will have for the consideration of any other question that comes before us.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the Senator from Maine will insist upon taking up his appropriation bill now, and it can at least be read to-day. I think we have made great progress already. There are but two appropriation bills, as I understand, ready now for the Senate, and they can both be disposed of, in my judgment, on Monday if we begin now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Why not go on with this debate to-day?

Mr. STEVENSON. Because I think there are a great many gentlemen, who have engagements this evening, who want to hear the Senator from Ohio. That is the reason. We can have this bill read, in which they do not feel any interest.

I must, however, enter my protest to one thing, and that is the declaration that the appropriation bills are more important than this discussion of the Louisiana case. I think that the time has come for us to know how far this Government is to exist as a free representative republic; and it is useless for gentlemen on the other side to expect to silence Senators on this question, because the debate can come up on an appropriation bill legitimately. We had better go on in a friendly spirit and take up the appropriation bill now. We can finish both the legislative bill and the fortification bill on Monday, and then we shall be clear of appropriation bills for some time. There can be no objection to that, and then we shall all have the pleasure of hearing the Senator from Ohio when he comes to discuss the Louisiana question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course I will institute no comparison between the importance of this question and the appropriation bills; the latter is an absolute necessity. I have not made up my mind yet that this is a crying necessity at this time after these two weeks of debate, but in my judgment it will be regarded by the country as trivial to a very great extent, and that it has other considerations than those of pressing public importance; and after having listened two full weeks to this debate, I doubt exceedingly whether there is any public concern which demands that any question which is clearly of a public character shall be put aside for its consideration. I am willing to go on with the appropriation bills at any time when it is the pleasure of the Senate; but I do not intend on any question which I have charge of to hesitate, the moment that I think it is ready to be brought to the consideration of the Senate, to oppose it to this proposition which has now consumed so large a share of the time of the Senate. That I say in reply to my honorable friend who attaches more importance to this question than he does to the subject of appropriations at this session of Congress.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wanted my honorable friend to take up the appropriation bill now. I beg him at this very minute to take it up. I want to give precedence to appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, if there is such an anxious desire to elaborate more largely upon this question of such profound public importance, I want to know why not go on with that now? As there are so many people here aching to go on, anxious to tell their constituents about the magnitude of this question, its gravity, and how constitutional liberty is in it, and how the usurpations of this Government ought to be rebuked and further denounced, why not go on now if you are ready?

Mr. COOPER. Will the honorable Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not yet. My motion is to proceed on Monday with the legislative appropriation bill. That does not stand in the way of your proceeding until to-morrow morning.

Mr. COOPER. We will go on.

Mr. SHERMAN, (to Mr. MORRILL, of Maine.) After you give way, I will go on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I give way. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. This little debate has at least convinced every member of the Senate that time is not only precious to us but precious to the people of the United States. When Senators expressed a degree of impatience at listening to an argument on Saturday night, I felt a desire to postpone the consideration of this question; but I was willing to do so only upon one condition, that it should not delay any practical measure of legislation or postpone any appropriation bill. But as it is manifest that if we are to engage in the discussion of the Louisiana question any further, we must speak as we can, by day or by night, I will commence what I have to say at the most inconvenient hour of the day, just at the time when dinner invites, and at a time when we are usually in the habit of separating.

Mr. President, the first matter that I wish to call your attention to is the gross injustice that has been done——

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. NORWOOD. He can have the floor on Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot do that, because it would displace the appropriation bills if I were to be entitled to the floor on Monday.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio, if it suits his convenience, to give way to an adjournment with the understanding that he shall have the floor when the two appropriation bills which have been mentioned are disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is idle to talk now of such an arrangement. There is other business standing at the heels of this. I am willing to go on now or after a recess. The only motion I will give way to now is a motion to take a recess, if any Senator thinks he would rather go home and get his dinner and come back.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather go on now, I think. We are here on Saturday night, and we might as well carry on this Louisiana debate and close it Sunday morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the first matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate is the gross injustice that has been done in this debate to the President of the United States, to General Sheridan, and I may say to the republican party. I doubt if the history of this country has furnished a parallel to the character of declamation and arraignment of these high officers upon grounds so false, frivolous, and causeless. My colleague, on the day after the transactions of the 4th of January, hastily introduced a resolution, addressed to the President, not couched in the usual language of courtesy, calling for official information in regard to matters that had occurred in Louisiana on that day. No objection was made to its passage, but only that it should be put in the usual form. At once a heated debate occurred in which language of the most violent character was uttered, perhaps by none more than the generally calm and dignified Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] When I come to look over his speech and notice the marked language uttered by him, and compare it with the actual facts now before us, I must express my amazement that he should have uttered such language upon even the alleged facts then before him, and especially in the absence of all official information or statements from the high officers he arraigns. In speaking of General Sheridan the Senator uttered this language:

> Now, sir, I ask the Senate and the country to listen to the tone of this officer and see, when you have read his dispatches to the Administration here, who shall say whether he is even fit to breathe the air of a republican government.

Again he says:

> Ah, Mr. President, if there was the tone that under other administrations animated the Executive of this country, he would never sign his name again as Lieutenant-General of the United States Army.

In other words, General Sheridan is denounced not only as unfit to breathe the air of a republican government, but as having committed an act of such moral turpitude, such gross outrage, that he ought at once to be dismissed from the service of the United States as Lieutenant-General of the Army. So my honorable friend in the heat of the excitement of this debate has arraigned the President of the United States in language scarcely less severe. He says:

> There is not in that State one case of abuse of power, of peculation, robbery, and filthy dishonesty, with which the history of its government is filled in the last two years, in which his displeasure has ever been signified by the removal of an improper official, not one word of rebuke.

Again, sir, he says:

> The President of the United States was advised of it; he was kept well informed of it, and his semi-official utterances, made known to the people, were that, no matter what frauds should be accomplished by this board, they should be maintained at every cost, or that "somebody should be hurt" in case interference was attempted with their nefarious proceedings.

Again he says of the President and General Sheridan:

> Where do we see them now? Overthrown and cast down by the furious lawlessness, by the unlawful ambition, of these two officials whom I have named, the creature and the creator.

Such is the language used by the Senator from Delaware about the President of the United States and the Lieutenant-General of the Army.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] also was in hot haste to pass judgment against these high officers and the republican party. After near one week's debate the resolution was adopted calling on the President for information. Up to that hour the President's voice had not been heard; the Senate was in utter ignorance of the material facts in this controversy until the message came in; and yet my friend, not satisfied with the declamation that had been uttered, eagerly entered the lists before the President could possibly reply to our call, and with studied rhetoric, carefully written and conned over, which must have consumed in preparation all the time that elapsed since the events of the 4th of January—refusing to wait, saying at the outset of his remarks that we know enough already to characterize the transactions of the 4th of January—not waiting for the very information that we all voted to call for, entered the debate and joined in the accusations. Sir, he would not have done this to the meanest culprit that walks your streets; and yet he would thus array, try, and condemn his fellow-soldier, without a hearing and without the facts. Sir, when I heard his statement of facts, I knew at once that his argument, based upon such a statement, was utterly unreliable and undeserving of any consideration whatever. Read the first page or two of his speech, containing his statement of facts—the basis upon which his argument rests; note the omissions of material facts now known to us and the distortions of other facts; contrast this statement with the real facts now communicated to us, and the gross injustice of his arraignment becomes so palpable that no reply to it is necessary. It will stand as additional evidence of his ability, and also as a monument of hasty but gross injustice to high officers of the Government, his compatriot soldier, and to the republican party that has honored him with all the trusts that it could confer upon him.

Nor was this injustice confined to these halls. The same arraignments extended as if by preconcert all over the United States. The governors of States sent forth their views on this subject in messages to Legislatures. They would not wait for the ordinary current of events. I have here an extract from the message of Governor Parker, of New Jersey, in which he denounces the action of the President of the United States as a usurpation, upon alleged facts totally at variance with all the material facts now known to us. But the most remarkable production is a speech made by Governor Allen, of Ohio. I shall not say how far this speech is colored by the peculiar circumstances under which it was made, at a banquet given on the 8th day of January, when he as an old Jackson Democrat probably felt very buoyant and very happy. In that speech he is reported by a friendly paper in speaking of Louisiana as saying:

> The whole of the vote was cast; a conservative majority was elected. Some dispute as to the returns of the election arose, as has been the case hundreds of times. This dispute, under the constitution and the laws, could only be settled by the legislative body which the people had elected. How was it settled? It was settled in the old way of despotism, settled by an armed body, settled by the Army of the United States paid by your taxes, settled by a man who was ordered there for his lawless military despotism—

Alluding to General Sheridan—

> And now, after having turned out enough of the elected members of the triumphant party to give to the minority the control of the law-making power of that State, he wants to make a big job, and he telegraphs to the President of the United States that every white man in the three States is a bandit and outlaw, and in order to get rid of them by a short, quick process, so that there will be no trouble in the future, he wanted to pursue precisely the course Cornelius Sylla pursued with triumphant party, for he slaughtered one hundred thousand citizens of the other party. Having done the deed he was found dead, rotten in his bed from head to foot and eaten up with worms.

That is the opinion of Governor Allen of General Grant and General Sheridan. But that is not all. To fan the excitement a meeting in the great commercial city of our country was suddenly held and organized under a call that was a palpable falsehood, and is now shown by the message to be a palpable falsehood. The statement made in that call was as follows:

> The legislative body of a sister State, peaceably assembled, has been broken into and dispersed by Federal troops acting under orders from the President of the United States.

Every affirmative proposition in this call is an absolute falsehood, admitted now to be so, shown to be so by the message of the President of the United States; and yet upon this call, in the heat and excitement of the moment, able men, men who stand high in the confidence of the people of this country, met in public meeting at the Cooper Institute and denounced General Grant and all authority. I believe that the time will come when some of the gentlemen who participated in that meeting will deeply regret this gross injustice that under the heat of excitement, created by false information and for political effect, was done by them.

Now, sir, what was the occasion of all this denunciation? What caused this commotion? We have now the facts. They are stated in the message of the President of the United States and also in the various documents which have been spread before the public. We know the height and depth and breadth of the offense that was committed on the 4th of January in New Orleans. What has the President done that was illegal or wrong? What act or order of his is complained of? What power has he exercised that was not plainly, palpably his duty? He ordered some of the troops to New Orleans to preserve the public peace and to suppress domestic violence. This was done upon the legal requisition of the governor of Louisiana. He was as ignorant as we were of what was done there. He gave no order or direction which contemplated what was done. He sought to avoid the use of troops in Louisiana, and in August last withdrew them. The result was an armed and treasonable overthrow of the government of one of the States. By the general approval of the people of the United States he suppressed that rebellion and restored the State government, and that without shedding a drop of blood. The troops were left there to preserve the public peace and were appealed to and relied upon by both parties. Such was his offending and no more, and for this he was arraigned upon false information by honorable Senators, governors, and citizens. For this he is compared with Sylla and all the brutal tyrants of ancient and modern times.

And how about Sheridan? What had he to do with the events of the 4th of January? Absolutely nothing. He was present as a spectator, just as the committee of the House was present. He had authority by virtue of his rank to assume command, but he did not do so, for he did not anticipate the lawless seizure by Wiltz and his confederates of the organization of the house of representatives of Louisiana. It was not until nine o'clock that night, when actual fighting was imminent, that he assumed command. The next day he sent to the President indignant telegrams, but these were no part of the events of the 4th of January, and I will have occasion to refer to them further on.

And yet Grant and Sheridan are accused of dispersing a legal Legislature by the Army of the United States in such hot haste that they would not wait to know the facts, and with such language of vituperation as would be used against the basest criminals, and by Senators, governors, and citizens who have characters at stake. Sir, they have overdone this business, and the sober second thought of just men will turn these accusations against the accusers.

Now let us examine what did occur in New Orleans on the 4th of January last; and we have two prominent facts to deal with: first, the illegal, violent, and revolutionary seizure by Wiltz and the minority of the house of representatives of Louisiana of that house and its organization; and, second, the expulsion by General De Trobriand, an officer of the Army of the United States, acting under the orders of Governor Kellogg, of five men claiming to be members of that house, but having no right to participate in its organization. This is the gravamen of the charge against that officer—the whole of it.

Let us look now a little more closely at the law which governed the organization of that house. A material and vital question in this controversy is whether that house was organized or in any sense a legal legislative house at the time the expulsion of the five alleged members took place. I understand my colleague to affirm that it was. I deny it; and there is one material question in this case. If that was a legal assembly, a house of representatives authorized, and those men had a right to participate and vote—if it was then duly and legally authorized as a house of representatives, I would admit that the conduct of General De Trobriand was totally unjustifiable and that Governor Kellogg had no right to disperse them, and that no order from any authority whatever could interfere with the organization or with the conduct or action of that house once legally organized. But there is the question——

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt my colleague for a moment. He says that is all the question. I say it was organized; but that is a matter for discussion hereafter. Does my colleague mean to affirm that, whether that organization was irregular or regular, any irregularity authorized an officer of the Army to enter and take out five claimants to seats, and men who had been elected to that body, some of them by a majority of over 1,000 votes? Where is the authority for the interference of the Army, whether the organization was regular or irregular?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give my colleague my precise view of it in my own order of time and in the order of events, and he will see before I get through exactly what my opinion is on all these points.

He alleges as the basis of this complaint that the house of representatives was duly and legally organized as a legislative body when these five men were ejected, and that these five men had a right to participate in that organization. That brings me to the consideration of the election law of the State of Louisiana. This law has been so often read that I do not think it necessary for me to read it again. It is sufficient to say that the law of Louisiana is like the law of most of the States, and that under the law of Louisiana a returning board was organized composed of five men—in this case I am told of two democrats and three republicans, all of whom but one, I believe, were natives of the State of Louisiana—it was organized according to law, and it had the right to pass upon the returns of members. It was the duty of this board to make out a list of the members, and that list was handed to the secretary of state; by him it was communicated to the clerk of the old house, who by law was the temporary presiding or organizing officer of the body. That list was made out in due form. It contained on it one hundred and six names, and of these one hundred and six persons one hundred and two appeared in the hall of the house at the hour and on the day designated by law. Of these, it is admitted on all hands that fifty-two were republicans and fifty democrats. This division of the body into two parties is a fact that will be recognized by all. It is admitted that fifty-two men, calling themselves republicans, met together and nominated as their speaker Mr. Hahn, and that fifty met together and nominated as speaker of the house Mr. Wiltz. Then we here have the palpable fact that out of one hundred and two men whose names were entered upon the roll and who answered to their names on that memorable 4th of January a majority, fifty-two, were republicans, who had nominated Mr. Hahn as candidate for speaker, a minority; of them, fifty, were democrats, who had named Mr. Wiltz for speaker. Those one hundred and two men had the sole right to vote then and there for speaker or for anything else. Will my colleague admit that?

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say then he shows the weakness of his argument, because now he is driven to say that men who were not entered on that roll, whose election was disputed, had a right to go there with or without law and vote; and there is the point—the initial point.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not say that men had a right to go there with or without law. I have said no such thing. I say that I will demonstrate, if I am capable of demonstrating anything, that those five men were as much entitled to their seats, and to participate in that organization, as my colleague and myself are entitled to seats on this floor; and I will prove it by the constitution and laws of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the law of Louisiana here, and we will start upon this initial point fair and right. This question is to be decided by the law of Louisiana, and by no other law; and here the statute is plain:

> Be it further enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly, and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators-elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate, respectively, and those representatives—

> those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provisions, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate.

If this is to be tested by the law of Louisiana, here you have it. The one hundred and two men who responded to their names on the roll-call on that memorable day were the only men in all the world who had a right to participate in the organization of that house; and no man, whether elected or not, no man, whatever might have been his title, under the law of Louisiana was entitled to vote there except those men who were returned and who answered to their names when the roll was called.

That is the initial point, and as I hear the argument of my colleague I do not see how he will get over that. The one hundred and two men were present in bodily form; they answered to their names. Fifty-two had already in an informal way designated their choice for speaker. Fifty of them had also designated their choice. A majority were republicans and in favor of the election of Hahn. What next? By the law of the State of Louisiana the clerk performs certain functions in presiding over that body during its organization. This law has already been read:

> That for the purpose of facilitating the organization of their respective bodies, the secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives shall hold over and continue in one office from one term of the General Assembly to another, and until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

I do not rest my position solely upon this law, because the precise character and duties of the clerk are not defined. And I do not discuss this case upon technicalities. I rest it upon the fundamental principle that the majority had the power in that body to control its organization, to elect its speaker, to elect its clerk, to control the organization, and that nobody else had the right to appear there until other members were admitted legally and formally after the organization was perfected. Whether the clerk was to preside or not could not change the right of the majority to organize the house, though his right to preside was an important provision to secure a regular and orderly organization. The law of the State of Louisiana, like the law of Congress, like the law of many of the States, thus provided for a temporary presiding officer in order to guard against the very evils that have grown out of the attempted usurpation of Wiltz. But the fundamental and controlling principle was the right of the majority of those named on the roll and then present to decide who should be speaker cannot be questioned. But, sir, what occurred? The roll was called, and then suddenly, without notice, by preconcert, a man by the name of Wiltz was nominated by, I suppose, a member of the house as temporary speaker, an officer unknown to the law of Louisiana. Suddenly, without a legal vote, he rushed up to the chair, seized the gavel, and declared himself temporary speaker of that body. At once there was a call for the vote. By what vote was he elected? Did anybody vote for him more than the forty-nine other democrats beside himself? No man pretends it. Any man who says that there is any evidence, by inference or otherwise, that Wiltz was elected by the majority of that assemblage there who were entitled to vote, says what is plainly and palpably false. Of the one hundred and two men whose names were on the roll, Wiltz never received, by shout, by sanction, by uplifted hand, or in any way, the votes of more than forty-nine others besides his own. That we all know; and yet against the known wish of the majority, already ascertained in an informal way, he went up and seized possession of the chair, took the gavel, drove the clerk away, and assumed authority there.

Let us go a little further. Who voted for him? Does my colleague say that the republicans voted for Wiltz? No. He may say that these five men voted for him, but the law of Louisiana declared that they should not participate in the organization. They had no right to vote, and he could not possibly have received any but the forty-nine votes of his associates and his own vote, fifty in all. Who declared him elected? Nobody. He declared himself elected. He was a usurper from the very beginning. By what authority did he act? By the authority of violence, by the authority of impudence, by the authority of the minority, and not the authority of the majority. The majority of the names on that roll, and who had the right to control that organization, never voted for him. He never was elected speaker even of that temporary organization. The facts upon this point are stated in various sources of information. I am glad to say that on this point no one of them varies. They are all of the same bearing. The statement made in the telegram of General Sheridan is borne out in every particular by all the other statements which have been made and submitted to Congress.

There is one principle in this Government which I think my colleague will agree with me upon, and that is that in this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the majority must rule. Here was a designated body of one hundred and two men authorized by law to do a particular thing, to organize that house. Any successful overthrow of that majority is a denial of the very basis and corner-stone of our republican institutions. Now let us see how important this elementary principle of our Government is. I will ask the Secretary to read one or two paragraphs from Cushing's Manual on Parliamentary Law.

The Secretary read as follows:

115. In all collective bodies of men, assembled and acting together for the purpose of deliberating and deciding upon any subject, or for the purpose of electing to any office, it is an admitted principle that whatever is done or agreed to by the greater number shall stand as the act or the will of the whole. This principle assumes, as its basis, the absolute and perfect equality of all the individuals, one with another, who enjoy the right of suffrage, in the possession of the elements essential to the determination of any act to be done, or to the formation of any judgment to be pronounced, or to the effecting of any election to be made, as the act, judgment, or choice of the whole.

116. This equality being conceded and, as the foundation of a system of government, it can neither be denied in fact nor questioned in principle—it is easy to conclude, first, that the knowledge and wisdom of the greater number—taken promiscuously, will be superior to the knowledge and wisdom of any smaller number of the body of men; and, secondly, that as whatever is done or resolved by the greater number affects and operates upon the individuals themselves composing it equally with the others, that which is so done must necessarily possess the quality of justice in a higher degree than the act or resolution of any smaller number would be likely to possess. It is upon these grounds that the common sense of mankind recognizes the authority of the majority as the only solid foundation of all popular government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also ask the Secretary to read on page 167, sections 412 and 414.

The Secretary read as follows:

412. The rule of decision, in all councils and deliberative assemblies whose members are equal in point of right, is that the will of the greater number of those present and voting—the assembly being duly constituted—is the will of the whole body. Hence whatever is regularly agreed upon by a majority of the members of a legislative assembly is a thing "done and past" by that body. Where the assembly is equally divided, there is, of course, not a majority in favor of the proposition which is put to vote, and that proposition is consequently decided in the negative."

Mr. INGALLS. Will it suit the convenience of the Senator to yield to a motion for a recess?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no desire on the subject. I would as soon go on now as at any other time.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought it might suit the convenience of the Senator. If he does not desire it, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am so much a lover of the regular order of business, and I am determined so rigidly from this time until the close of the session to adhere to it, that I am willing myself to speak at the most unseasonable and worst hour in the whole twenty-four in order that I may hereafter stand by the rules and push forward the business of the session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will yield the floor to me for the purpose of making a motion of adjournment. I desire that he shall continue his speech at his own convenience in proper time; and he had better do it on Monday, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the Senate adjourning, if it sees fit; I proposed that some time ago, but in the pressure of business I think we had better go on. I have no objection to the motion being acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion being put,

The PRESIDING OFFICER declared that the motion appeared to be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Gordon, Hager, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, and Thurman.—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Clayton, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Howe, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Scott, Sherman, and Windom—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, and Wright—40.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 18, 1875.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, D. D., of Washington.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received from the House of Representatives on Saturday last were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Patents:

The bill (H. R. No. 1317) to enable Jennette Hathaway, executrix of the last will and testament of Joshua Hathaway, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for improved device for converting reciprocating into rotary motion;

The bill (H. R. No. 4202) to enable Mrs. Christiana L. Williams, administratrix of the estate of C. W. Williams, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for improvements in canal locks and gates; and

The bill (H. R. No. 4335) authorizing John Hazeltine to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of his patent for a new and useful water-wheel.

The bill (S. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters and Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1874, as to the necessity of an assay-office at Portland, Oregon; and also as to the expediency of removing or abolishing the assay-office at Boise City, Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORTON. I present the memorial of Hon. Jesse J. Brown, of New Albany, Indiana, on a very important question connected with the tariff, accompanied by a letter. I move that this memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, together with the accompanying letter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Samuel Strong, praying that the board of audit for the District of Columbia be required to settle all claims, as provided by "an act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT presented three petitions numerously signed by citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to restore the 10 per cent. duty taken off certain foreign products in 1872, and also praying for the passage of the currency bill introduced by Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, providing for the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of James E. Slaughter, of Alabama, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Edward B. Rollins, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Nemaha County, Kansas, asking that Moses Shepherd, a soldier of the war of 1812, may be granted a pension. As the committee have already reported a bill on this subject, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of numerous soldiers and sailors of the volunteer forces, now residents of Smith County, Kansas, asking for the passage of an act providing for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Hiram Sawtelle, guardian of Lydia J. Church, orphan child of the late Nathaniel G. Church, who was a private in Company E, Third Regiment Maine Volunteers, praying that a pension may be granted to Lydia J. Church; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of G. W. Stedham and John R. Moore, Creek delegates, praying the payment of certain moneys arising from the sales of undivided reserves by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of Joseph F. Minter, of Texas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of William Kearney, of Texas, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of John Withers, of Texas, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of H. Clay Espey and others, citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, remonstrating against the establishment of a depot on the south side of Massachusetts avenue on square 681, by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, where that company now proposes to establish it, and praying that it be obliged to select another and more suitable site north of that avenue where there will be less danger of accidents; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Anton Tschudi, late a musician in Company A, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension on account of an accident occurring to him at Atlanta, Georgia, by which his leg was broken, necessitating amputation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. OGLESBY. I move that leave be granted to withdraw the papers accompanying the petition of E. B. Clemson filed at the second session of the Nineteenth Congress. I make the motion because, among the papers filed in the Senate, there is one that must be used in a trial in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois. The trial comes on during this week, and I want the papers withdrawn, by the permission of the Senate, so as to forward them for evidence in that trial. I make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should it be done?

Mr. OGLESBY. The papers were put here in order to get a new location of a bounty-land warrant about which there had been a mistake. The petition was sent from the House here, and Congress passed a bill giving him the right to locate one hundred and sixty acres, in place of one hundred and sixty acres that the location was made upon through error. In order to get that mistake corrected, he filed, with his petition, a patent, and it is on file here now. A suit is pending about that quarter-section in the southern district of Illinois, at Cairo. I have these facts from Mr. BURCHARD, a member of the other House; and the parties only want to get the patent withdrawn in order that it may be used as evidence at the trial in Cairo.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Courtlandt Parker, administrator cum testamento annexo, of George W. Anderson, deceased, asking reimbursement for certain stock in a mining company alleged to have been seized and sold under illegal decrees of the United States courts for the southern district of New York, reported a bill (S. No. 1147) for the relief of Courtlandt Parker, as administrator of George W. Anderson, deceased; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 696) referring to the United States Court of Claims for adjudication and determination a claim for the past and future use of an invention and letters-patent thereon, and now in general use by the Post-Office Department in the postal service of the United States of America, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2875) authorizing the use of certain evidence, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, memorializing Congress to pass an act to give to all United States courts of districts bordering on the Indian Territory concurrent jurisdiction with the western district of Arkansas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the State central committee of the union republican party of South Carolina, in reply to certain allegations contained in a memorial of the so-called tax-payers' convention of that State, heretofore presented to Congress, in respect to excessive taxation imposed by the present State government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the formation of a commission to adjust losses sustained by A. P. Jackson and others by being ejected from certain lands covered by a Mexican grant, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking reimbursement in the sum of $500,000 for moneys expended in military operations to preserve the peace in that State in 1868 and 1869, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 1013) explanatory of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1874, and the bill (H. R. No. 3622) to amend the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, in relation to bonds of clerks of the courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon, the provisions of both these bills having been included in a bill already reported; and they were postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1103) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Utah, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3911) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. NORWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Williams, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, late of the First Battalion Pennsylvania Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1154) granting a pension to William Williams, late captain First Battalion Cavalry Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1148) to remove the political disabilities of James E. Slaughter, of Mobile, Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1149) declaring the meaning of an act approved March 9, 1868, relative to a patent for induction apparatus and circuit breakers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1150) to establish a mint for the coinage of gold and silver at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1151) to remove the political disabilities of Dr. D. B. Conrod, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1152) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the "Grand Chain;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1153) amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1155) removing the political disabilities of W. E. Wysham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ANN R. VOORHEES.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I move to reconsider the vote of the Senate of January 5, 1875, by which the bill (H. R. No. 2355) granting a pension to Ann R. Voorhees was indefinitely postponed, and, with the papers in the case, recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I ask unanimous consent to this.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill named and to recommit it, together with the papers in the case, to the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

CLAIM OF E. D. BARKER.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire into an alleged loss by robbery of Edward D. Barker, late deputy collector of internal revenue in the Territory of Dakota, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now submit certain affidavits and statements in relation to the transaction, to go with the resolution. I move their reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF PATENTS.

Mr. ALCORN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be instructed to inquire whether the patent No. 31252, granted to J. J. McComb, of Liverpool, England, on the 29th of January, 1861, for improved cotton-bale tie has been extended by the Commissioner of Patents; and if so, upon what notice, and whether any further legislation is necessary to provide for giving to those interested in opposing the extension of patents sufficient notice of the application for such extension.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further resolutions, according to the order made on Saturday the Chair will call on the committees for the selection of business on the Calendar for action. The Chair will first call on the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON. I have no business to present this morning in the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next committee in order is the Committee on Foreign Relations. [A pause.] There seems to be no response from that committee. The Chair will call next upon the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL BANKS WITHOUT CIRCULATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are quite a number of bills on the Calendar from the Committee on Finance, and I will take this occasion to ask that they be disposed of in their order. Most of the reports are adverse reports and they ought to be got off the Calendar. The first bill is on the first page of the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 71) to authorize the organization of national banks without circulation. That is superseded by legislation passed since the bill was reported. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF BONDS BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then on the next page is the bill (S. No. 147) authorizing national banks that have decided to reduce their capital stock to withdraw a proportion of bonds upon retiring their own circulating notes or depositing lawful money of the United States in the proportion provided by law. I move that that be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF 3 PER CENT. CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next is on the same page, being the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1874. I move that that be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SARGENT. What is that bill?

Mr. SHERMAN It is one of a series of bills relating to the organization of national banks which have been superseded by our free banking law of the present session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS, AND FREE BANKING.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill on the Calendar from our committee is on the bottom of page 4 of the Calendar. It is the bill (S. No. 124) for the resumption of specie payments, and for free banking. That is reported adversely, and is superseded by the legislation already had. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING OF INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next is on the top of page 5, being the bill (S. No. 408) to provide for the refunding of internal-revenue taxes improperly assessed and collected. That was reported adversely by the Committee on Finance. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next is on the same page of the Calendar, being the bill (S. No. 396) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864. I will let that stand over to the next call, at the suggestion of a colleague on the committee. It may be necessary to amend it somewhat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

THE COINAGE ACT.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next is the bill (H. R. No. 2878) to amend the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873.

Mr. SARGENT. My impression is that that is the bill taking off the coinage charge.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is superseded.

Mr. SARGENT. I hold in my hand a letter of the Director of the Mint, not written supposing that this bill would come up, in which he makes this suggestion; after asking me to send him a copy of the bill, he says:

It will probably be necessary to pass the bill in order to get rid of the charge for copper alloy, a very insignificant item but which will make a slight difference between the market and coining value of free gold bullion.

I think we had better perhaps lay over this bill for further examination, or else let it be passed, as it can do no harm. It is a mere question of alloy.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee report it adversely. If the Senator desires it to stand on the Calendar, very well.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee, judging from the other bill they reported, have probably changed their minds as to the propriety of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have repealed the coinage charge, but not the alloy charge.

Mr. SARGENT. This is a mere fragment left by inadvertence. This bill perhaps had better be passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will look into it.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; let the bill be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will remain on the Calendar.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill is the bill (H. R. No. 1955) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans. The committee reported adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that that bill went upon the Calendar at the request of the Senator from Louisiana, who is not now in his place, and therefore perhaps it had better be passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The adverse reports, it seems to me, had better be taken off the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection. I only suggested that because of his absence. I do not think there is anything in the bill that should induce us to pass it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It had better go off the Calendar. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

E. BOYD PENDLETON.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill of ours is on page 12, which was reported adversely. It is the bill (S. No. 653) to relieve E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue of the fifth district of Virginia. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

J. E. D. COUZINS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill in order is on page 12 of the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis. I ask that it be considered. The bill was reported favorably.

The bill (S. No. 958) for the relief of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis, Missouri, of $2,000 in full for services rendered to the Government of the United States in the detection and conviction of counterfeiters of United States Treasury notes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

Mr. SHERMAN. The report is pretty long. This is a case where peculiar services were rendered in the time of Secretary Chase. The bill was strongly recommended by Secretary Chase and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the money could not be paid there because it was an old claim. The facts are all stated in the report, and if Senators desire to hear it, it can be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not necessary to take up the time in reading the report. It is all right.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Michigan made the report. It is only a small sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why can it not be paid out of the current appropriations?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. There was no money at the time applicable to the purpose. That was the reason why the then Secretary of the Treasury was unable to pay this gentleman. Secretary Chase afterward gave that as the reason, and he wrote a letter to the then Secretary of the Treasury, who is the present Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] recommending the payment of a sufficient amount. The committee thought $2,000 was a very small amount for the services rendered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MINT LAWS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill in order is on page 19 of the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 777) to amend the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873. That is a bill in which I think the Senator from California is interested.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that this bill might be passed over now, so that we may have time to look at it and see which one the Director of the Mint refers to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TAXES ON CIRCULATION OF STATE BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next is the bill (S. No. 731) to reduce tax on circulation of State banks to an amount equal to that paid by national banks. That is reported adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DAVIS. I should prefer that the bill remain on the Calendar, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. The object of this call is to get rid of these bills and clear the Calendar. It is lumbering up the Calendar to keep on it all these bills.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a bill that the people whom I in part represent feel a good deal of interest in; and there are two or three Senators probably who, if there is an opportunity during the session, may want to speak upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not object to its remaining on the Calendar if the Senator says any gentleman wishes to be heard upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will remain on the Calendar.

NOTES OF GOLD BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill in order is on page 20 of the Calendar, the bill (H. R. No. 975) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, which was reported adversely. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have that bill read.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, so as to read;

SEC. 3. That upon the deposit of any United States bonds, bearing interest payable in gold, with the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner prescribed in the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the national-currency act, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue to the association making the same circulating notes of different denominations, not less than five dollars, not exceeding in amount 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, which notes shall bear upon their face the promise of the association to which they are issued to pay them, upon presentation at the office of the association, in gold coin of the United States, and shall be redeemable, upon such presentation, in such coin: Provided, That no banking association organized under this section shall have a circulation in excess of $1,000,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I feel great reluctance to taking up any of the time which is devoted to committees in the morning hour; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this bill is very important to the banks which pay their notes in gold, which now are principally, I believe entirely, located in the Pacific States and Territories, but which by our approach toward specie payments may be enticed into other States and probably finally will be the form of bank which will be the most prominent.

The only proposition in this bill is that banks paying gold shall have the same amount of currency issued to them in proportion to the amount of bonds which they file in the Treasury that non-specie-paying banks are allowed. In the one case it is now ninety cents on the dollar; in the case of gold banking it is only eighty cents on the dollar. It seems to me that the credit of the nation is well enough established. It is now at least 16 per cent. above the value of paper, making 36 per cent. margin for gold notes if this matter is equalized. The credit of the Government is well enough established for us to go upon this 20 per cent.; or even the 10 per cent. between ninety and one hundred would be sufficient to guarantee the Government in its suretyship on these gold notes.

I think that the operation of the original section is such as to discourage and fetter the organization of banks of this character. It has been a matter of constant complaint on the part of our business community and of those who are engaged in this banking that the amount of currency they received was but 80 per cent. of the bonds deposited, while other banks receive 90; and they complain of it not merely as a matter of comparison that others were having higher privileges, but that it was embarrassing to their business, that it was a great hardship which the Government put upon them. There have been petitions after petitions sent to us on this matter, and letters from business men who do not write unless they feel that there is a necessity for their request being heard.

I do not think that any good reason can be given why this measure should not pass. It has passed the other House, and I trust the Finance Committee will allow this bill, which simply puts these banks on an equality with the others, to pass. If we asked for any superior privileges, if we claimed that there was a merit in banks paying gold, that they ought to be encouraged and have exceptional privileges, then exception might be taken to such an argument; but certainly it is fair and reasonable for us to ask that banks so paying gold shall have at least the privileges which are given to others who simply redeem in depreciated paper. I therefore hope that the bill may pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance considered this matter fully and understand it perfectly. The whole case arises out of a discrimination that is made between the amount of notes issued to gold banks and to currency banks. Under the law as it now stands, when a bank is organized on the currency basis it may receive 90 per cent. of the amount of its bonds in circulating notes, while the gold bank receives but 80 per cent.; and the reason for this distinction is palpable. In the first place, when a currency bank starts it must buy bonds at from 15 to 16 per cent. premium. On the basis of bonds at that price in currency value, they can only issue 90 per cent. of the principal of the bonds in circulating notes; so that the security of the note-holder is a bond worth 26 per cent. more than the amount of the notes issued upon that security. When we came to organize gold banks, when the price of bonds and the price of gold was about the same, so that bonds might be bought at about the par of gold or a slight increase only, we, necessarily, to make the system homogeneous, only authorized the issue of 80 per cent. of the amount in gold notes. That makes the security of a gold note stand on precisely the same footing as the security of a currency note. The currency note for one dollar is secured by a bond which is worth $1.27, while when a gold note is issued for one dollar it is secured by a bond worth $1.20.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from Ohio permit a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to get through with my explanation.

Mr. SCHURZ. It bears on the Senator's argument right here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SCHURZ. The difference which he states undoubtedly exists; but is it not also certain that as the premium on gold declines the market value of bonds will also approach par, and that therefore in the same measure the difference will disappear between the two cases?

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the next point I was going to make.

Mr. SCHURZ. Another question in connection with this is, would it not be well, under present circumstances, to afford some facilities to gold banks that will encourage their establishment, for it will evidently be a thing working favorably in the direction of specie payments?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think just the contrary. If in four years, as we all now anticipate and as the people I think have generally made up their minds, there will be no difference between gold and paper, then there will be no difference between a gold bank and a currency bank, but all will stand upon the same footing under the general law. This, therefore, is a mere temporary measure, to give an advantage to a gold bank over a currency bank.

My own judgment is that these temporary laws ought not to be passed, and the Committee on Finance upon this point was unanimous that we ought not to change the relations which now exist between the gold banks and the currency banks. They are on the same footing now practically, and as we approach specie payments all banks will be organized not as gold banks nor as currency banks, but all will be organized upon the same footing under the national-currency act, and the notes of all will be redeemable practically in gold.

To show that we did not desire to discriminate against the gold banks we have repealed that provision inserted in the old law which limits the amount of circulation of a gold bank to $1,000,000, and now the gold banks are in every respect on the same footing with the currency banks. The discrimination between the 90 and 80 per cent. is caused by the fact that there is now in market value an actual discrimination between the currency note and the gold note. The difference between the currency note and the gold note being now about equal to the difference between the amount that is issued in the one case of currency notes and of gold notes in the other, I think the law had better stand as it is. There is no practical difficulty. Indeed, I am assured by the constituents of the Senator from California that the chief difficulty in the way of the organization of gold banks is now removed. Some of the banks that are now organized in California may without too great a sacrifice enter into the national banking system, and I hope they will do so.

This question has been maturely considered. I do not think this bill ought to pass; at all events it ought not to pass during the morning hour, because it will create considerable confusion. If the Senator desires it to go over so as to call the attention of the Senate to it hereafter at a time when it may be debated, I have no objection to that.

Mr. SARGENT. If the bill were to be passed over now instead of being acted upon, I should fear that we may not reach it again. Perhaps I might as well allow it to be indefinitely postponed at once. Under the rule which we have adopted it is provided that the committees may call up their bills for action and for debate during the morning hour. The Senator has very forcibly presented everything that could be said against this bill, and yet it seems to me that his arguments fall short, and that there are good reasons, which must strike the Senate, why the bill ought to pass.

As we approach specie payments, by the argument of the Senator, this discrimination becomes greater against these gold banks, because the other banks which now pay merely currency, and are authorized to redeem in currency will still be authorized to do it; and banks which always have paid in gold will hereafter have to do it, and are required to do so by their charters. They will have to disincorporate and reincorporate under the currency law, or else they will be compelled still to pay in one hundred dollars in coin bonds to give but eighty dollars in currency, because by the very provision of their charter they are not allowed to pay in any lawful money except gold. Now, though gold be worth paper and paper be worth gold, and they be entirely equal, nevertheless these banks cannot pay over their counters currency without forfeiting their charters. They will be compelled, therefore, to put themselves under the general currency law and go out of existence as gold banks. This being so, it must be admitted that there is great discrimination against them.

Furthermore, the 20 per cent. which was originally exacted was exacted at a time when the credit of the Government was low. It was then supposed to be necessary to the security of the Government. The Senator shakes his head. If I remember, the organization of the gold banks was at a time when there was a depreciation of about twenty to twenty-two and a half cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shook my head to correct the Senator on that point. The bill was passed in 1870, and at that time gold stood just about as it does to-day. We have not approached a single step toward specie payments from 1870 to this hour. Senators will probably remember that gold stood then at about 110 to 112, and that was the reason for the distinction.

Mr. SARGENT. There have been fluctuations backward and forward, and the Senator, who is usually correct in his figures, may be correct in that matter. Gold has been worth as much since, and it was worth more just before that. Suppose the bill had passed a year or two before, you would not have thought of exacting more than 20 per cent. Whenever the fluctuations shall turn so that gold is nearer to paper, then if 20 per cent. was right when gold was higher it becomes a hardship, and the nearer you approach specie payments the greater the hardship is. It costs just as much capital to buy the bonds for a gold bank as it does to buy the bonds for a currency bank. The gold banker cannot go into the market and get his bonds any cheaper than the man who wants to start a currency bank. He has to put down for every dollar of the national bonds just as much valuable property as the man who wants to buy them for any other kind of a bank; and, therefore, it seems to me the argument with regard to the cost of the bonds is rather specious than otherwise.

So far as the wishes of the people of my State are concerned, I speak with great confidence. I know to what the Senator alludes. The Bank of California, which has a capital of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, has been excluded by the limitation which has heretofore been put upon gold banks, limiting their amount of circulation to $1,000,000, from going into the system, because it would be compelled to give up three-fourths of its business; but that limitation finally, after years of trouble, has been taken off. We think it would be a great advantage to our coast, to its general moneyed interests, to induce a large, stable, able corporation like that, with immense resources, to adopt the national currency, and adopt it in its best form of the national gold note; and finally, after numerous discouragements, after fighting step by step and calling back bills which had been indefinitely postponed and putting them on the Calendar—after making the fight myself in the other House several years—finally, at this session, under a more liberal feeling toward gold banks or some motives of general policy, Congress has taken off that limitation. Is that to be used as an argument why other discriminations against gold banks shall not be taken off?

I say the only question is whether the Government, when it takes one hundred dollar bonds, has sufficient to redeem its pledge to make good the default of the bank to redeem the currency in case of its failure, when it gives out only 90 per cent. on currency. If it has sufficient security, that is the only question to be considered. Does the chairman of the Committee on Finance or any other Senator say that the Government, with $100 of its own interest-paying gold-bearing bonds, has not sufficient security for ninety dollars of gold notes? Then let us put it upon that plea, and that only, and say the Government cannot afford to do that in view of contingencies. I believe, however, that that is ample security to the Government, and you want no more than the security to the Government, because it is a fetter on the business of our coast.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I be permitted to ask the Senator from California a question?

Mr. SARGENT. With pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know that the Senator from California, like myself, stands on hard-pan. We have already adopted a policy looking toward ultimate resumption of specie paying on the part of all the banks. Now I desire to put it to the Senator from California whether he does not perceive that to allow these gold banks to issue gold notes will actually swell the amount of currency and will therefore inflate the currency, so as to make it somewhat difficult for those banks which are not specie-paying banks to resume four years hence?

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly must say to the Senator that I do not see that at all. I do not see how an obligation payable instantly in gold, as these notes are, over the counter, and have been for years, can be an inflation of the currency, unless the same argument would apply to the gold mines of California, and we should be required to stop digging out gold and coining it for fear of inflating the currency!

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow this matter, which in all probability cannot be acted upon to-day, to be passed over until the next call, so that I may secure the passage of a bill which I desire and which is important for immediate purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. I want a vote on this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over.

Mr. SARGENT. Then it goes to the Greek Calends. I should like to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, then, that it be indefinitely postponed. The Senator cannot have a vote on the passage of the bill now, because even if it is to be passed it ought to be amended. It had better pass over to another call. I will call it up in the course of time if the Senator wishes, but I want to pass this morning a bill that is important.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, I will defer to the Senator and let it stand over to the next call or seek an earlier opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BANK EXAMINERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next bill reported by the Committee on Finance is a matter upon which I should like to have the action of the Senate. It is the bill (H. R. No. 3825) to amend the national-bank act, and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The Committee on Finance had reported an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so amended that the latter clause of said section, after the word "chancery," fixing the compensation of persons authorized to make examinations of national banks, be amended so that the same shall read as follows, namely: "That all persons appointed to be examiners of national banks, not located in the redemption cities specified in section 31 of the national-bank act, shall receive compensation for such examinations as follows: For examining national banks having a capital less than $100,000, $20; those having a capital of $100,000 and less than $200,000, $25; those having a capital of $200,000 and less than $300,000, $30; those having a capital of $300,000 and less than $400,000, $35; those having a capital of $400,000 and less than $500,000, $40; those having a capital of $500,000 and less than $600,000, $50; those having a capital of $600,000 and over, $75; which amounts shall be assessed by the Comptroller of the Currency upon and paid by the respective associations so examined, and shall be in lieu of the compensation and mileage heretofore allowed for making said examinations."

Mr. SCOTT. I think I can explain the bill in a moment so that it will be intelligible. The present provision in reference to the compensation of examiners of national banks reads thus:

And every person appointed to make such examinations shall receive for his services at the rate of five dollars per day for each day by him employed in such examination, and two dollars for every twenty-five miles he shall necessarily travel in the performance of his duty, which shall be paid by the association by him examined.

It will thus be seen that the compensation of the examiners is daily pay and mileage. This bill fixes a specific sum to be paid for each examination and cuts off the mileage, but exempts from the operation of the bill the redemption cities, for reasons which are stated in a letter of the Comptroller of the Currency accompanying the bill, which I desire to have read. It is with the bill among the papers. I may state, while the Clerk is looking for the letter, that the substance of it is that the bill as now reported will give to examiners of banks outside of the redemption cities practically about the same amount of annual salary that they now receive, while it will prevent the abuse of which complaint has been made, of charging very large mileage for traveling from one portion of the country to another. The reasons are stated in the letter of the Comptroller of the Currency why it should not apply to the redemption cities. There the salary is much larger than that paid to examiners who travel through the country. If this bill were made applicable to banks in the redemption cities, it would make the salaries so small as to deprive the Department of the services of examiners whom they deem it important to have in those cities.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that as I heard the amendment read it speaks of amending section 5240 to come in after the word "chancery." I am unable to find any word "chancery" in section 5240. It may be there, but I am quite unable to find it. I suggest that the amendment ought to be corrected in that respect.

Mr. SCOTT. Unless there is an error in either the printing or the citing of the section, the language is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The section is correct, but the word "chancery" referred to does not exist in the section, according to my observation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the letter be read, and we will examine this point.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, January 7, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d ultimo, enclosing H. R. No. 3825, "An act to amend the national-bank act and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners," with the request that I will examine the same and return it with suggestions for the consideration of the committee; and in accordance therewith I return the bill with amendments written upon it. The rates provided in the bill as amended correspond, as a rule, to the rates which have been collected from the national banks for almost the entire period since the organization of the system. In the redemption cities, where the proportion of surplus to capital and of deposits to capital and surplus is very much larger than in the country banks, the rates have been much higher. The aggregate amount collected from the forty-eight national banks in the city of New York during the last year was $8,400, and the amount collected from the fifty-three national banks in Boston for the same period was $7,650. One bank in the city of New York pays fifty dollars for its examination, and all the others pay from one hundred to three hundred dollars. The examiners for the cities of New York and Boston were both appointed upon the nomination of the clearing-houses of those cities respectively; and the assessments in Boston have been made in accordance with a schedule prepared by the clearing-house, with the intention of paying the examiner a salary of $5,000 and his assistant $2,500. The compensation of the examiners in these and the other redemption cities is not excessive, and it would be almost impossible to devise a schedule of rates which would seem to be reasonable and yet afford adequate compensation to examiners in these cities. I have therefore thought best, in returning the bill, to exclude from its provisions the compensation to be allowed to examiners in the redemption cities, as without the amendment suggested it would be impossible to obtain the services of competent examiners. If passed without amendment, the bill would authorize the payment of only $2,990 in New York, and $3,510 in Boston, for salaries of examiners and their assistants in those cities.

I am, very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. JOHN SCOTT,
Of Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. There is a misprint in the amendment. The word "chancery" ought to be "comptroller."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That correction will be made in the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like some information of the committee which has reported this bill. I do not possess the requisite knowledge myself, and am not therefore able to tell whether the scale of prices proposed is just. I presume it is, or it would not have received the approbation of the committee. I can conceive that as a rule it may be correct; but here is a bank examiner in a given State and he is called upon by the Treasury Department to examine a small bank, it may be where the compensation is lowest, and I believe that is twenty dollars, in a remote section of the State. He may be obliged to travel hundreds of miles, and his expenses of travel may be more than the compensation that he receives for the service that he performs. Will the scale on the whole be sufficient to overcome such cases as may exist of the character which I have named? If it be as a whole what will furnish a fair compensation, I have no objection to the bill; but if it be not, if you have only fixed the scale upon the ground that the sums therein named are to be paid in a regular examination, you ought to provide, it seems to me, in the bill against the contingency to which I have alluded, to wit, the examination of a single bank in a remote section of a State hundreds of miles away from the examiner, where his expenses would exhaust his compensation. It seems to me there ought to be some provision to meet such a case as that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer is, that the bill will not materially change the aggregate pay of these examiners, taking the year through, but it will prevent complaints that have occurred in regard to the gross charges for expenses, mileage, &c., and prevent controversies by making the charge specific. It will leave the pay of the bank examiner practically about what it is.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator say whether he thinks under the amended bill the same amount of service will be rendered, that the examination will be as thorough and as careful?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of that. The chief trouble now is about the mileage. The banks have to pay all these expenses.

Mr. SCOTT. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I desire to say that my attention has been called to the question whether this bill which has been prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency, while it may correct the amounts to be paid to the examiners outside of the redemption cities, does provide in sufficiently explicit terms for the payment of those located in redemption cities. I think that inquiry is of sufficient importance, as the morning hour has about expired, to permit this bill to go over for the purpose of examining that question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 15th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 743) to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia; and

An act (S. No. 744) to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of Saturday is now in order, being the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] upon which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. In pursuance of the statement made by me on Saturday of my disposition never to stand in the way of any practical business of legislation, I will yield the floor for the present to the Senator from Maine who wishes to move to take up an appropriation bill, hoping that when the Senate resumes the consideration of the Louisiana case I shall be allowed to finish my remarks.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to postpone the resolution and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.
